had believed on that occasion that when the great Liberal party said they could carry a better measure they really would have been able to do so. He regretted that the Bill introduced by Earl Russell in 1860 was not passed; and when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire introduced his measure last year he gave it every support in his power. No man was a more ardent supporter or a warmer admirer of the right hon. Gentleman than he was; but this was a question beyond the interests of party. It was a question in which the whole country was interested. The country wished that a Reform Bill should be passed. The right hon. Member for South Lancashire had said he wished that a Reform Bill should be passed—that it should be passed this Session, and, above all, that it should be passed by the present Government. He concurred with the right hon. Gentleman in all those wishes, though he should have preferred to see a Reform Bill carried by the Leader of the Liberal party. He could not go into the question of rating; but he knew that if Scotland was to be treated as it was proposed to treat England not fewer than 40,000 would be added to the constituency of Glasgow which he had the honour to represent. He therefore felt it to be his duty to assist in the endeavour to enfranchise those 40,000.

MR. HUBBARD said, that he also found himself in a position of extreme difficulty. The first Bill of the Government, imposing a £6 rental franchise, was received with general acquiescence by the Conservative party; and he could not but regret that it had been withdrawn, and that they were asked to substitute for it the present measure. Last year he had voted for a rating franchise as the best qualification, but not in the sense now contended for by the Government as the basis of their Bill—namely, that the voter himself must be the payer of the rate. He regretted that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) had felt himself compelled, on account of the division that took place on the question of rating last year, to withdraw his Bill. That Bill was founded upon an intelligible principle—that a £6 rental franchise would admit so many of the working classes as to destroy the due influence of those already upon the register—and therefore the right hon. Gentleman proposed a £7 franchise. He had never opposed that principle, and would be quite prepared to adopt it now. The

Government were then reproached with having introduced too democratic a measure; but now the present Government, stopping neither at a £6 nor at £5 limit, proposed to admit to the franchise every one who lived in a house and could by any possibility be rated. Under the late Bill it was calculated that 300,000 would be enfranchised; but the present proposition, in its naked form, would enfranchise 700,000. Well, but to prevent the full extent of this enfranchisement, a variety of safeguards had been introduced. The dual vote would, no doubt, have been highly effective; but it was so utterly obnoxious that it had been abandoned, the double period of residence was proposed but would be abandoned, and nothing would then be left to check the operation of the household suffrage, pure and simple, except certain obstructions to the possession of a vote by imposing the condition of personal payment of rates. Now, he could not agree in the opinion that there was anything in itself to recommend the scheme of personal rating, or that it had any particular merit apart from its avowed purpose of being a safeguard and restriction—and if the able argument of the Solicitor General was to be accepted, that personal rating is already embodied in the whole of our electoral system, it was difficult to understand what especial virtue it could possess when introduced as a corrective against the unlimited enfranchisement of the working classes. Now, either the proposition was one which presented difficulties to the intending voter—and, if it did, those difficulties would not be long endured—or it was one which gave a vote to every householder without imposing difficulties, in which latter case it became household suffrage. But to household suffrage he bore an invincible repugnance, and he was consequently in this peculiar position, that he was going to vote against the Government proposition, because he believed it led to household suffrage, while several hon. Gentlemen opposite were going to vote against it because they thought it did not lead to household suffrage. If they were sincere in their desire to extend the franchise, let them not interpose difficulties in the way of its exercise. If they were not sincere in their desire to extend the franchise, let them not pretend to do it. He regretted that the Bill had been prepared with such haste that in consequence of the urgency that existed for the consideration of the Bill itself, no opportunity could be given for the due consideration of the law of rating. He felt himself quite unable on this question to support the Government; but he differed from them with great regret. He had always given them his independent, though most willing support; but he could not hide from himself that the measure which they now propounded was one of the character which last year and in the early part of this year they had most strongly deprecated. He was therefore not prepared to become in a moment a convert from the views which he had always held, and which the Conservative party had maintained throughout the Reform debates of last year.

MR. HORSMAN: I only wish to intrude myself on the attention of the House for a few moments—without entering into the general question or prolonging the debate—in order to state the grounds of the vote which I am about to give. The Amendment of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire now in your hands, Sir, may be read in two senses. It may either be regarded in a narrow and limited sense, as dealing only with the question of personal payment of rates, or it may be considered as part of a complete scheme of Reform, set forth in a series of Amendments of which this is but the first. Now, in the first of these views, as regards compound-householders, the facts have been so universally admitted and the arguments have been so exhaustive that at this stage of the debate we can do no more than state the general conclusion to which we have been brought by the speeches of others instead of endeavouring to contribute any new materials to form a judgment of our own. It is admitted that the compound-householder is in no way inferior in status to the man who pays his own rates—not inferior, I mean, in intelligence and trustworthiness. His condition is a mere accident. It is not a matter of his own free will or choice; but he is a compound-householder under the operation of a law for which he himself is not responsible. Now, if the class to which he belongs ought to be enfranchised, enfranchise it generously and fully. If not, refuse it the franchise. But to say that you are about to give the franchise to a whole class, and to add a limitation which takes it away from two-thirds, is an inconsistency and a mockery so transparent that instead of being a settlement of the question it must lead to disappointment, anger, and increased agitation. When we regard the question from the other point of view, as a new scheme of Reform set forth in a series of Amendments, it comes into competition with the Bill of the Government. Now, the Government Bill is founded on household suffrage with two years' residence and personal payment of rates. The alternative scheme of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire is founded on a £5 rating franchise, with one year's residence, and the enfranchisement of compound-householders. The Government scheme in addition makes a distinction between those who are above and those who are below the £10 line. For the latter two years' residence is required; for the former only one. The scheme of my right hon. Friend makes the condition of one year's residence apply to all voters alike. I have listened with a good deal of attention—I may almost say impartial attention—to the speeches which have been made on both sides of the House as regards the alternative proposals; and I say sincerely that the conclusion to which I have been brought is that, if this question were regarded entirely apart from all party feeling and considerations, five-sixths of the House would prefer the scheme propounded in the Amendments of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire. More than that, I sincerely believe that that would be the feeling of the occupants of the Treasury Bench. Such being the case, what does it behove the House to do? The question is one of difficulty and of great responsibility. Every one wishes to arrive at an honest and a speedy settlement of this question of Reform; but, at the same time, we all feel that the Bill of the Government has not presented to us any satisfactory or acceptable basis for such a settlement. The only excuse for a Government, at a time when it was supported by a party numerically so weak, and with such questionable antecedents, dealing with the question at all was the hope that it might be able to propound a measure which would be acceptable to the country. Now, in that hope I am quite sure not one even of their most ardent supporters will say that we have not been generally disappointed. The Bill which the Government have propounded has been acceptable to no party and to no class, and the speeches made on the other side of the House have certainly not been palatable to the Treasury Bench. Then the measure has been generally condemned by the Liberal party; and out of the House the masses and the unenfranchised, for whom it was specially devised, have at all their meetings denounced it. They have sent a deputation to the right hon. Gentleman the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, and besought him to reject the Bill, even at the risk of postponing Reform for another year. It is a fact that never was a great measure propounded by a Government on a great subject which was met with so universal a chorus of condemnation. Everything goes to show that the great Conservative body have abandoned their principles without acquiring popularity; and that it is much easier to discredit a party than to beguile a nation. In these circumstances, it certainly would appear to have been the duty of the House to have dealt differently with the Bill in its earlier stages; but as the opportunities for that were allowed, from one cause or another, to pass away, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire has embodied in a series of Amendments what has been termed an alternative scheme to be dealt with as a whole. Now, dealing with it as a whole, it is my opinion that the Bill of the Government is democratic in its principle, with a narrow and restrictive enfranchisement, whereas the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman is more Conservative in principle, with a more generous enfranchisement. The scheme of the Government is complicated, delusive, vexatious, and disappointing to those whom it most concerns; while the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman is simple and perfectly intelligible. It is admitted on both sides of the House that it presents a basis for a just, safe, and satisfactory measure. In these circumstances, believing, as I do, that to pass a delusive measure would be discreditable to the House and dangerous, as a mockery, to the country, I feel myself bound by every obligation of public duty and of public policy to condemn the Bill of the Government, and cordially support the alternative scheme of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I congratulate the right hon. Member for South Lancashire as I congratulate the right hon. Member for Stroud—the one that he has found an additional follower and the other that he has at last found a leader. The right hon. Member for Stroud in supporting the Amendment, which exactly resomble the Bill of last year, has acknowledged that he was mistaken in the course which he adopted in 1866, when he repudiated the leadership of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire, and he has now found that submission is the better policy. The House is asked by the right hon. Member for South Lancashire to take a step that has never been taken in this House before, and I am surprised, I am astonished, I will not say how much I am pained, by the speeches made by some of my hon. Friends below the gangway, who in order to defeat the Bill of the Government have adopted an Amendment which is contrary to every principle they have ever expressed—which is contrary to the whole current of our legislation, and which I believe to be destructive of all the elements of national representation. Before the passing of the Reform Act the suffrage, so far as great constituencies were concerned, depended upon scot and lot and the payment of rates. When the Reform Bill was introduced the same system was retained, and personal rating and payment of rates were indissolubly connected with the right to vote. Last year, in the Bill of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire, the principle of payment of rates was omitted, and I and several other Gentlemen who sat on the same side of the House considered that as the most objectionable feature of the measure, and that which we ought strongly to resist. But now, when this Amendment is proposed as part of a scheme—without knowing what they will be called upon to vote afterwards, and without knowing whether they are voting with persons who wish to carry it out in its entirety—the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent and others have to my astonishment adopted that portion of the Amendment which is absolutely ruinous to the suffrage proposed by the Government. The Government have been much abused, and much attacked, for having dealt with the question at all, and I quite admit that we stand on our defence for what we have done in this respect. When the present Government accepted office Lord Derby declared that he did not consider himself bound to deal with the question of Reform. But when the Government had to consider the question they unanimously came to the conclusion that it was necessary to deal with it in some shape or other. They did not do so with any desire to rush into a vortex such as that in which we now find ourselves in-

involved—nor to quote the words which the hon. Member for Stoke has thought fit to impute to his personal friends “with the effrontery of the Treasury Bench”—but with a deep sense of the responsibility of public men who are acting for the interests of their country. [Mr. BERESFORD HOPE: Assuredly I did not tax you with effrontery.] We thought it was our duty to deal with this question of Reform. And having come to that determination, we had to decide on what principle we should deal with the question. That line which the right hon. Member for South Lancashire is attempting to draw, has been attempted over and over again, and has been over and over again rejected. We examined the question with care. We did not wish to enter upon a scheme which should not have some definite and lasting basis, and if hon. Members have come to the conclusion that these checks, if we may so call them, or these conditions, as others may call them, are insufficient protections, it is for them to devise what other protections may be given. I address those who think those checks are not sufficient. I am aware that many on that (the Opposition) side think there are too many; but whichever way it be it is for those hon. Members, on whichever side they sit, to endeavour to carry out their views with honesty and with determination of purpose. But we have undertaken to deal with this question, determined to adopt a basis which should be permanent, and I believe that the principle on which it stands is one that may be permanently adopted in this country. It is a question of drawing the line such as the right hon. Member for South Lancashire proposes to draw, I do not care where, and we have adopted what I may call the power of self-selection on the part of the constituency. The right hon. Member for South Lancashire has spoken as if we were going to introduce in some places a great flood of voters and in other places none at all. He has spoken of some cases in which he says, “Here you will add one vote, or I do not know whether you will add even one. I admit that you must make the proper deductions in all these cases;” but though the right hon. Gentleman had been telling us we ought to make all these deductions, when he wanted to alarm my right hon. Friends on this side of the House, he took the whole numbers to be poured into the constituency, and did not deduct from them the 30 or 50 per cent necessary to arrive at a proper conclusion; while, on the other hand, when he wanted to show that we wished to restrict them, he turned to the compounding householders, and would not admit that a single man would come in. When the right hon. Gentleman is complaining of our admitting a flood, what is he doing? He is introducing the same kind of occupation franchise, which now exists under the £10 clear annual value? What is the consequence of that? Why, according to the right hon. Gentleman's plan—and he talks of the power and influence which men of wealth are to exercise—according to his plan, any man may set out a number of allotment gardens with a pig-stye on each of them, and there would be a building and land together, with the power and influence of the landlord who chose so to set out his property. In the evidence with respect to Totnes and other places, we find that buildings have been erected on such lands—at least, what are called buildings. Notwithstanding that, the right hon. Gentleman deliberately introduces them without a clause to limit the value of the buildings, and says that with any kind of building and land together of the annual value of £5 a man shall have a vote. Such is the course which the right hon. Gentleman has taken; he admits people without residence—people who may be living in the smallest and meanest lodgings, but who have this small building and bit of land rated together at £5. Every man below that he shuts out altogether, without giving him the power to claim a vote, even if ready to pay the rates. He says the compounders pay as truly as other persons, and he challenges us to contradict it. I contradict it flatly, and I will take an instance existing in this metropolis, and I wish to know whether the compounders in the district of Poplar are paying the same rates or anything like it as those who are not compounding. I wish to know whether, as the rates are rising in the district where they are mainly compounded for by the landlords, and are growing up from 8d. to 2s. or 3s. in the quarter—I wish to know whether in that case the person compounded for is paying at the same rate as the person not compounded for? Is the compounders' rent raised? It could not be raised, for he is too poor. Is it raised in consequence of rising rates? It certainly is not. Who are the persons who suffer from the raising of the rates? It is the persons who are not compounded for, and who are many of them helping to support these very compound-householders, who, without the payment of rates at all, the right hon. Gentleman wishes to admit to the franchise. Why, Sir, is there no difference between direct and indirect payment? I do not want to go back too far. As was shown last night by the Solicitor General, although last year the right hon. Gentleman opposite left out of his Bill qualification by direct taxation, previously he had been a party—twice, at least—to bringing in measures under which parties who paid direct taxation were to be enfranchised. Do not the indirect taxpayers pay just as truly as the direct payers? If that is true, why were they not placed upon the franchise in the same way? The reason is, not whether they pay or do not pay, but that one man takes an interest in the matter towards which he pays his money—he takes an interest in the local concerns of the place which he inhabits—while the moment that direct payment is taken away he becomes wholly uninterested in those concerns. We are accused of not allowing those persons who do not pay their rates directly to come on the franchise. But what is the case with respect to those franchises in which they are immediately interested? Do they vote in vestries? No. Do they vote for the guardians of the poor under whom they so frequently come? No. Do they vote for local boards of health, which concern them so materially in all their transactions? No. And why? Because this House has thought them unfit to be intrusted with those franchises. Are we, then, acting in the spirit of the law as it exists, or are we acting contrary to the law and raising up something new? I say we are acting in accordance with that which has been the feeling of Parliament hitherto, which has been consecrated in all your Reform Bills and in your law; and it is that which the right hon. Gentleman, by this Amendment—whether it applies to his own £5 franchise or to our franchise—is attempting at once to do away with. Another thing surprised me much. The right hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman) I think made a Motion that the Report of the Committee on Municipal matters which was presented to the House of Lords some years ago should be communicated to this House—with an object I presume. But what was that object?

The right hon. Gentleman had read that Report before he moved that it should be printed. It was a Report to show that where you had done away with the payment of rates directly under the Small Tenements Act you had injured the municipalities; that instead of the municipalities being governed by the property of the place, the result was that the smallest portion of the property and the greatest portion of the numbers secured the elections for those municipalities; and I am sorry to say that bribery and corruption prevailed, in small sums certainly, but to a very great extent. [Mr. HORSMAN: At a lower franchise?] Yes, a lower franchise to some extent, but a higher franchise to a certain extent than that which the right hon. Gentleman has condemned, because that was practically a three years' residence, instead of a two years' residence, as proposed by this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman the other night asked why the Small Tenements Act was passed. I was very anxious to know what he would say to that, and he said very much what I think was the correct thing, and a justification of the Government for not introducing every compound-householder upon the register at once. He said that the compounding Acts might properly be called Acts for obtaining the payment of rates from persons from whom they could not previously have been obtained. Now, what is the meaning of that? That there is a certain class of people to whom you may look in vain to pay the rates through the regular collectors. Any one who will inquire in our large towns, and in our small towns also, will find that where the Small Tenements Act does not prevail, and where persons are called upon for direct payment of rates, there are vast numbers of excusals. I was noticing the other day one of these cases—the case of Cheltenham—and I was struck with a remarkable fact. There was no distinction made between the male and female occupiers, and therefore it was impossible to tell how the voting would be affected, but there were more excusals from the rates—in some instances even as high as between a £9 and £10 rating, and increasing lower down—there were more excusals from the rates between the lowest point and £10 than there were male occupiers. Now, I would ask the Committee to look at this question fairly and honestly. Do they wish these persons, who are so excused their rates in consequence of their inability to pay, to be placed upon the register? The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield has put that point with perfect clearness. He says, "I wish to exclude persons of that description." I also wish to exclude them. They are not bearing their due share of taxation—and so far from doing so, they are throwing an additional burden on those who do take their due share. I do not want to find fault with these people because they are poor. The right hon. Member for South Lancashire stated—and I know not whence he derived his information—that somebody or other had said that the compounders are inferior in character, and that they are given to cheating their creditors and to getting drunk. Will any one tell me who made this extraordinary statement? Certainly it was not made by any one on this side of the House; but it has evidently been thought of by the right hon. Member for South Lancashire, and ought to be hung up in the workman's shops along side the well-known passage from the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Calne. I deny the assertion made by the right hon. Gentleman that this Act is to be used for disfranchising purposes. The right hon. Gentleman says there is no moral test in our proposal. I ask, where is the moral test in £5? Is the sweeping net that catches every fish in the stream up to a certain size—is that much better than the net which takes in only fish that are worth catching? As to the figures of the right hon. Gentleman, I do not dispute them at all. I have always considered that this Bill is a Bill of self-selection. It is a Bill which begins by enfranchising a certain number of ratepayers, but not the enormous number which has so alarmed the hon. Member for Stoke-upon-Trent. The hon. Member has drawn into his calculation the name of every person on the rate book. That is a great mistake. Instead of 750,000, as supposed, probably not more than 50 per cent of that number will come in under this measure. I suppose he must allow that a number will not be admitted to the franchise. We have been told that there are a number of persons knocking at the door for admission to the franchise. We say to them, "Be so good as to take hold of the handle of the door, and come in." "No," says the right hon. Gentleman, "You must go out and force them to come in. It is quite a mistake to suppose that they will take any trouble in getting the franchise. True, they talk about it a good deal; but it is too much trouble to them to do anything. You must relieve them from all embarrassment." Then we have been told about fines and penalties, and I know not what. It is true we differ in some respect from Sir William Clay's Act. Now, when Sir William Clay brought in that Act, I believe Earl Russell objected specially to that part of it which relieved persons from the full payment of rates. This was the case the first year the Bill was brought in, but in the second year the Bill passed with comparatively little alteration. I am not going to dispute the policy of that Act. It is the law, and there is an end of it. But when hon. Gentlemen contend that there is so great a difference between Sir William Clay's Act and this Bill, let them remember that under the Act there must be a claim and payment or tender of rates. Suppose the tenant pays the rates. He is not recouped by the landlord; and if therefore under Sir William Clay's Act the tenant pays his rates in order to get upon the register, is he fined or not? The landlord is not bound to repay him, and yet you say we are dealing with the tenants in a more unfair way than they are dealt with under Sir William Clay's Act? Now, what is the real state of the case with respect to these compounding-tenants? As far as the Small Tenements Act is concerned, almost every man—I may say every man—is either a weekly or a monthly tenant. If he is a weekly or monthly tenant, why need we trouble ourselves to treat him as though he entered into a contract extending over several years, when he has only to say to the landlord, "I shall put myself on the rate book; we must settle our rent on a different footing;" and at the end of the week or the month the new arrangement may be entered into. That is my answer to all the arguments about fines and penalties. There is not one of these persons in 100 who holds a lease, except in cases where the greatest injustice is certainly worked by the local rating Acts. It is said that there will be inequalities under the plan proposed by the Government. I will not go into the case of the fifty-eight boroughs where every compound-householder is under £6; but I will take the case of the ninety-eight boroughs. Suppose the compound-householder claims to have his name immediately put on the rate book, he will have to pay the occupiers' rate in that borough. As to inequalities, are there no inequalities connected with £5 rating? Is such a rating the same thing in London as it is in Grantham? I know that there must be discrepancies under a £5 and under a £10 rating however you may legislate. You say that people will never quietly and contentedly pay their rates. No, not if the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire gets up and tells them that they have a grievance, which, however, they do not feel. But have compounding-householders above £10 rating under a local Act been violent agitators against it? Has Brighton been moved to its centre because a certain number of the compound-householders there have never got upon the rate book. Brighton has a local Act that extends their power to £20—a most unjust thing. There are other places where, for the convenience of the parish officers, the richer classes have been mulcted to a great extent and a burden laid upon their shoulders which they ought not to bear. Do we, then, propose anything new? At Brighton at this moment compound-householders are required to claim in order to come on the register. And in proposing a lower franchise we say, "You also must claim in order to get votes; but so long as you pay the rates there is no need to claim." I am quite sure there must be discrepancies, however you may legislate; and I defy any man to frame a measure in which ingenious people like the hon. and learned Member for Richmond and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire will not be able to pick a hole and show how difficulties will arise, especially if people are instructed how to make them. The vestries, it is said, may change all this; but I may remind the right hon. Gentleman that though he did not carry all his Instruction part of it was adopted by the House. Let him, then, in Committee, show some mode by which vestries shall be prevented from making the constant changes which are deprecated. Remember vestries cannot make such a change under a year, so they cannot act with any view to an immediate election; and, again, the tenant must have paid rates for two years before he can vote. Now, are you to expect that vestries will look forward for two years, and introduce changes when all the political objects which they may have contemplated will have passed away? If, however, you fear the exercise of this power by the vestries, put the thing right by legislation. The right hon. Gentleman says that one franchise is all-important; working men cannot get into this House in adequate numbers unless you have a lodger franchise. Now, according to his own statement a lodger franchise involves a claim from year to year, and last year he did not treat this as a workman's franchise at all, but almost entirely as a middle-class franchise. The right hon. Gentleman said in 1866—

"If they can show that the rooms they inhabit are of the clear annual value of £10—of course without including either rates, taxes, or cost of furniture—they will be entitled upon claiming year by year to be placed upon the list of voters."

And, again, the right hon. Gentleman says—

"I can give no information as to the number of persons who would, perhaps, be enfranchised under the title of lodgers; but this I may say, that my firm belief is that it will be a small one; and, in the second place, my firm belief likewise is this—what I now speak of will prove to be a middle-class rather than lower-class enfranchisement. I should be misleading the House were I to pretend to entertain the opinion that any large number of the working class or any very large number even of the middle class will come upon the register by virtue of that which we term a lodger franchise. Consequently, I do not venture to add any figures on this head."—[3 Hansard, clxxxii. 46, 47.]

Now, Sir, this is the object of the right hon. Gentleman's impassioned affection this year. Working men are now told that without this franchise they will be left in a deplorable condition, whilst last year they were told that so small a number would be enfranchised by the lodger franchise that the right hon. Gentleman could not really give a single figure to show how many they would be. Now, if the lodger franchise be what it is said to be this year—the all-important point of the Reform Bill—and that franchise require that the claim to be put upon the register should be made year by year, how can that be reconciled with the objection the compound-householders who only require to make one claim in order to be put upon the register? But the right hon. Gentleman says it is quite a different thing in the country from what it is in the town. I admit that in the country the Government plan of the personal payment of rates is a test of a man's character; but I want to know why on earth such a payment of rates should be a test of a man's character in the country and not in the town? I want to know the size of a town when a man begins to lose his character, or, at all events, not to set it up by paying his rates. But another objection has been made (it appears to me to be a most comical one) by the noble Lord the Member for Stamford. He says you are going to introduce a system of corruption; and I may here remark that, if that be my noble Friend's opinion, I am astonished that he went with us as far as he did. He charges us with introducing corruption; but let us see how the case really stands. The Government proposal is that a man is to pay his rates for two years before being entitled to the franchise. The supposition of the noble Lord is that somebody wanting to carry a great political point will begin two years before, and pay those people's rates over and over again, because a man cannot be put upon the register by a single payment. This corruption, then, is to go on for two years, in order that some time, say when a dissolution may come, some important political advantage may be gained. Can any one really suppose that any man will set himself seriously down to such a business as that? The noble Lord, however, presses that; but we are not to suppose that any man will be so corrupt as to let a man have a piece of land upon which to erect a pigsty, become his own tenant, fix his own rent, and thus become a voter. So much for the question of corruption. The right hon. Gentleman opposite, in his attempts to throw dirt, talked about the fantastic erection which we are building up. Household suffrage! What a deplorable state of things! Whenever the right hon. Gentleman even hears of it, he is dreadfully afraid, as if the Bill proposed a household suffrage such as he declares. Why, even the hon. Member for Birmingham does not wish to introduce what he calls the whole "residuum" into the franchise. I say, then, that a more dependent, a more corrupt, a more weak, or a more yielding person than the man who has put up some small pigsty under the influence of his landlord cannot be conceived. And yet that is what the right hon. Gentleman sets up against the Bill. The noble Lord the Member for Stamford and my hon. Friend and Colleague the Member for the University of Oxford have said that they are obliged to take this Resolution as part of a great scheme. Now, I must say, with great respect for my friends, that a more extraordinary proposition has never been submitted to the House. They propose to take the whole of the scheme of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire, and unamended they adopt the principle with which it begins, which is contrary to every profession and principle

upon which they have ever acted—namely, the principle of the non-payment of rates. They will take none of ours, but the whole of that of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. I know no man of whom I can speak with more regard than my hon. Friend and Colleague. There is no man to whom I would refer a question concerning my own honour with greater frankness, freedom, or unreserve than him; but when my hon. Friend gets up and tells us that, without sacrificing our personal honour, we can accept the whole of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire's Amendment, I must tell him that in such a case I myself must be the judge of what concerns my own honour. I say that anything more inconsistent with what I profess, and what I have put forward for my guidance as a Member of this Government, cannot possibly be conceived. I should consider myself degraded, and worthy of those reproaches which have been somewhat too harshly insinuated by the hon. Member for Stoke, if I were to submit myself to such humiliation. Sir, the noble Lord the Member for Stamford, and my hon. Colleague the Member for the University of Oxford, misinterpret this Bill. They attribute to it an effect which it neither would, nor was it meant to have. Their object is to get rid of the Bill altogether; and they see through a distorted medium the motives and actions of those who support it. For that reason, without imputing to them any unfairness towards me or my Colleagues in wishing us to take the step they recommend, I must say that I cannot accept advice on this point from those who are opposed to the Bill, and who have a misconception of its objects. I think it would have been much better if, instead of accepting a principle contrary to those which they have all along professed and acted upon, they had manfully acknowledged that their object was to get rid of the measure without being particular about the manner. If they had said, we wish to destroy the Bill, and are not scrupulous as to the weapon employed for the purpose, I could have understood them and would have said nothing about it. But if they support as they are doing the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, then I say that their acting is as contrary to their principles, as they say we are acting contrary to ours. Sir, it is no ordinary thing to see—and I hope we may never see it again—to see the noble Lord the Member for Stamford and the hon. Member for Birmingham rising at the same moment in the House, and with mutual courtesy each giving way to the other, because each was bent upon the same object. Where now are those unenfranchised millions of whom for so many years we have heard so much from the hon. Member for Birmingham; where the clients for whom he spoke, those five or six toiling millions of his countrymen, who were neglected, who were in a state of serfdom, who were never to be admitted to the franchise? And now the hon. Member for Birmingham is ready to support a £5 rating, because he does not believe that those persons whom we are ready to admit upon their claiming to be admitted will be enfranchised under our Bill. But he takes that wide sweep with the £5 franchise, as if possibly his life of agitation might be ended when that point was gained. But I am sorry to say that there are worse agitators than the hon. Member for Birmingham, and I fear that when one agitator has stepped out of the way there will be others to step into his place. What does the hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford say? That he has attended public meetings because he sympathized with their objects. But was there one of these public meetings at which the hon. Member attended where the object has not been residential manhood suffrage? I know—and let me say it to his honour and credit—that the hon. Member for Birmingham, when he did attend those meetings, distinctly stated that he was for stopping at household suffrage. [Mr. W. E. FORSTER: I said I was not for residential manhood suffrage.] I understood my hon. Friend to say that he attended those meetings because he sympathized with their objects, and one of those objects was residential manhood suffrage. But if my hon. Friend says he only sympathized, then I presume it was a platform sympathy with Parliamentary limitations. Well, Sir, the Committee has before it two Amendments of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire, and they are both of a peculiar character. There is one which has an absolute bar drawn across at a particular point, and it has the most extraordinary addition that I have ever seen put upon the Amendment paper of this House. Let me here remark that I should like to repeat the question I asked last year—how many days before the right hon. Gentleman introduced his Bill into this House last year was it based on a rateable franchise? There were certain figures in the Returns which convinced me that it was not originally drawn as a rental franchise, and I should like much to know when the alteration was made. That, however, will probably remain a secret for a long time to come. Probably some thirty or some sixty years hence, when the memoirs of the right hon. Gentleman come to be written, the secret will come out. What is the Amendment to be tacked on to all the other Amendments of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire? He proposes, in the event of the adoption of the Amendment fixing a limit of rateable value in Parliamentary boroughs, a clause to provide that—

“Whenever the rateable value of any tenement falls below £5, by reason of a deduction of more than 20 per cent from the gross estimated rental, the occupier thereof may claim to vote, and thereupon shall, if otherwise qualified, be registered.”

So that, although the making a claim is represented as such a frightful business, such a terrible obstruction, he draws a hard and fast line at £5, and then says that if any occupier below that sum thinks more than 20 per cent is deducted from the gross rental, he is to have the opportunity of going before the assessment committee, and asking to look at the valuation list, and may then go to the overseer and say, “I am assessed at a lower sum than I ought to be; I ought to be assessed at £5 instead of £4 10s.” He is to do all these things in order to get himself rated at the higher figure, and is to fine himself in order to obtain the franchise. [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented.] If I do not understand it I am afraid I am only in the same position as other hon. Members; but I believe that is what it means, that any man in the situation I have described is to have the privilege of being rated higher, in order to obtain the vote. But it is said that there is an enormous trouble and expense connected with obtaining the franchise under our Bill, and we are threatened with a tremendous agitation on this subject. I do not suppose the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire will go “stumping” in the provinces as he has done on previous occasions. Neither do I suppose the hon. Member for Birmingham, who must be somewhat wearied of excessive agitation, will go into the country. But we hear there are to be “Reform

meetings,” at which it will be stigmatized as a monstrous iniquity that the compound-householder should have to make a claim and pay his rates. Now, I will undertake to say that a procession to Beaufort House on a rainy day would involve a greater waste of shoe leather and waste of time, and fifty or a hundred times the trouble, than if the same persons were bent on getting their names placed upon the register. I do not hesitate to say that if they adopt that plan of agitating to get the franchise instead of going to the overseers to obtain the same object, that the trouble and expense will be fifty times as great. Mr. Dodson, I have troubled the Committee at some length. I believe the Bill to contain within it the materials for a permanent arrangement of this question. The right hon. Gentleman opposite from the very beginning has wished to get rid of that which we wish to retain. We say that the rate book should be the register. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!] The right hon. Gentleman has certainly not provided for this in his Amendments. He maintains that though the landlord pays the rates, the tenant shall have a vote. We say, on the other hand, that as the payment of rates induces an interest in local affairs, the man who so pays is more likely to be educated and take an interest in the concerns of his country. We say, moreover, that a measure based upon a £5 franchise is just as likely to be followed by renewed agitation as a rating franchise, because the one is as much opposed to residential manhood suffrage as the other. Do not suppose that you can by any means silence agitation. As an hon. Member has remarked, there will always be men whose only way of obtaining notoriety is to thrust themselves before the public as agitators. These men still continue to exist. It is not on those who seek to lead the poor and ignorant astray that we must look; but we must rely upon the firmness and good sense of those who go to the constituencies. We must not look to those who go to constituencies outbidding each other as to what they will do on these questions. [Cheers.] I can only say that I hope that cheer does not allude to anything I have said in former years. I have never since I entered Parliament been one of the “ardent” Reformers to be found in this country. As far as I am concerned I have taken up this question in order to remove an obstacle to all the other business of the House. We have been taunted very much for having done so, and the right hon. Gentleman has come to our assistance in what he calls a "friendly" spirit. The right hon. Gentleman has, however, adopted a tone of contempt towards those opposed to him which is not calculated to facilitate any progress on this subject. He has expatiated on the absurdity, the ridiculousness, and the folly of what we have proposed, consistent though that proposal is, with previous legislation, and with existing enactments. It does not seem to me that such a tone is calculated to bring about any cordial action between both sides of the House for the purpose of settling this question. The question between us is whether you will have this line hard and fast, as my right hon. Friend has described it, or whether you will adopt the self-selected system which we have proposed, and which we believe contains sufficient checks to prevent those who ought not to have the franchise from exercising it. Sir, in taking a position as one of Her Majesty's servants, I am thankful to say I did not become the servant of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. I confess I do not think he was an easy taskmaster to his own side last year, and he is not an easy taskmaster now, and he certainly is not a very conciliatory opponent of those who sit on this side of the House this year. It is not merely the mellifluous tone of the speaker, but the language, and the meaning, and the bearing of the Gentleman who uses that language that should be borne in mind. The right hon. Gentleman had better state at once, clearly, distinctly, and emphatically, that which his Amendment means. It means the destruction of the present Bill. It means emphatically that the Bill is to be removed from the consideration of Parliament. The right hon. Gentleman refers to threats which have never come from these Benches. Sir, the subject before us is a matter for the fair and dispassionate consideration of the Committee. It is for them to decide, and as for the sordid motives which hon. Members have not thought it unbecoming to impute to those who sit upon this Bench, I repudiate them with all the scorn which Parliamentary language is capable of expressing.

MR. BRIGHT: Mr. Dodson—I shall not say much to prolong this discussion to a very late hour; but I should like to make a few observations before the debate closes.

The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down made himself merry with the fact that last night the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Viscount Cranbourne) and I rose at the same time to address the House, and that I was willing to give way to him, and, as he says, the noble Lord was willing to give way to me, because we were engaged in the same cause. Well, if the noble Lord has made any advance towards my opinions—and I suspect since last year honestly and honourably he has made some—I can only say that I shall welcome him not only in this but in every good cause, as one of the most powerful advocates that it could be possible to receive. The noble Lord and I have never exchanged a word in private; but I take this opportunity of saying, that I listened to a speech made by him when he was in office, upon a subject very far removed from this we are now discussing, a discussion upon a subject connected with his own office. I mean the annexation of the territory of Mysore—and I have never heard a speech in this House which contained nobler sentiments, delivered in better language, and given in a manner more calculated to impress the House. I much regretted, therefore, that the noble Lord felt it his duty to leave the Treasury Bench. But if I may derive pleasure from the noble Lord having made some small approach to my views, surely I may be as much gratified by the not small steps, but the large progress, which the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has made since last year. I believe if the pages of Hansard were referred to it would be possible to show that there was scarcely a Member in this House on that occasion who felt or pretended to feel a greater terror of the admission of £7 householders than was felt by the right hon. Gentleman himself. I will not reproach him. I do not reproach his Colleague and Chief in this House, the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I am only too happy to find that they are willing to proceed even to the length of the measure which they have introduced, and I shall not break my heart if the measure as it comes out of this House should not take precisely the shape that I would like to see it take. But I shall console myself with the belief that the past barriers against a just representation of the people are broken down—and that the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his Colleagues have utterly repudiated the whole of the past with which they have been connected. Now, Sir, I shall endeavour in a few minutes to ask the attention of the Committee to the precise point which is before it, because I am now about to discuss this question as a matter of party. The Chancellor of the Exchequer made a bargain with us at the beginning of the Session that it was not to be a party question, and that it was not to be used for the overthrow of Ministers. I shall treat it in that sense. Last night I was surprised at the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire. I always listen to him with great pleasure; but last night I listened to him with great surprise, because, if my memory does not fail me, it is only three or four weeks ago—we have had so many Bills and so many discussions that I am puzzled as to dates—since the Member for South Lancashire threw out a hint to the House that it would be desirable to alter the law of rating, and draw a line excluding some and admitting great numbers; and the right hon. Gentleman in his place seized upon that hint, and gave a cordial approval of it; and I am not at all certain whether the Member for South Lancashire has not been in some degree induced to take the step he has taken in consequence of the powerful support of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. [Mr. HENLEY intimated dissent.] Well, the right hon. Gentleman is too modest to assume that he has that influence upon the Member for South Lancashire; but I really believe I am not overstating the case. Now, Sir, what is this Amendment which is before the Committee? It affects the borough franchise only, and it proposes what I think in our common sense we should all say is a very reasonable proposition—that every person to whom you offer the borough franchise, who is considered entitled to it, who may justly claim it, should be placed upon exactly the same terms, should have the same facilities for obtaining and enjoying it that every other person shall have; that is the object of the Amendment, so far as I understand it. It means that the present householder of £10 and upwards, and the householder from £10, and as much lower as the House may go, shall be exactly on the same footing, and that the compound-householder above £10 shall have no advantage over the compound-householder below £10. It means, in point of fact, that you shall not select from amongst your constituents a special class for special privileges; but that, having determined who are the persons on whom you will confer the franchise, you will deal honestly, and generously, and fairly, and equally with them all. Well, at this moment that is the state of the law with scarcely any exception. The Reform Act deals in a certain way with a £10 occupier. There has been a difficulty which has been already perhaps sufficiently explained with regard to the compound-householder; but still at this moment that difficulty I believe is not from the existing law, but it exists by the practice of the overseers of the poor. I was asking to-day a gentleman who is very profoundly versed in these matters, and he told me it is the law at present that all occupiers' names should be placed upon the rate book. And if that be so, of course the Instruction which I believe some time ago went out from the Poor Law Board that the rate books should be so formed, is in accordance with the law, and henceforth all occupiers will find their names upon the rate book, whether they be payers of rates directly or payers of a composition rate. Well, what will happen. I believe the Reform Act intended that all these persons' names should be upon the rate book and should be upon the register; that it is not Parliamentary law which has kept them off so many years, but lawyers' law, the decisions of revising barristers, and for a time the decisions of the Courts. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board, in the very able speech which he has made to-night, has never pointed out, and did not attempt to point out, any real ground why the compound-householder below £10 should be treated differently from his brother above £10. I want that to be explained to the House. I see no reason shown for any such exclusion, and I venture to say, in opposition to what the right hon. Gentleman has said, that that exclusion and that difference must be held to be a direct violation of the principle of the law as it now stands. Does the right hon. Gentleman deny that at the present moment the landlord's payment is, for the purpose of the franchise, the tenant's payment? If there were any doubt upon the matter I think it should be removed by my reading to the House an extract from a letter, in which is quoted the opinion of two very eminent Judges upon this matter, and who were especially eminent on all questions connected with appeals on registration law. The writer of this letter, who is himself a registration agent in the North of England, asks me—

“ Whether it is intended that no person shall have the vote who does not pay the rates out of his ‘proper hand?’ If so, we shall have two modes of payment of rates between the £10 voter and the householder proposed to be enfranchised. We have now many £10 voters who never pay a farthing of poor’s rate directly out of their own hands, but pay it in the amount of rent calculated to cover all charges by the landlord. It has been ruled in the Court of Common Pleas, by Chief Justice Tindal: ‘That the tenant was rated. That he held his premises under an express agreement with his landlord that the latter should pay all rates and taxes, and further, that these had all been paid.’ Chief Justice Tindal goes on to say: ‘It appears to me, that the tenant being rated under these circumstances, the calling upon the landlord to pay, and the payment by him, are equivalent to a bona fide calling upon the tenant to pay, and a bona fide payment of the rates by him.’ Mr. Justice Maule, a great authority, said in the same case: ‘It was at first contended that the payment must be by the party’s own hand. Generally speaking, the payment of money is a thing that is, of all others, the least necessary to be done by the hand of the party himself. There cannot be the smallest doubt that, where one gets another person to pay the rate for him, and allows it in account, that is a good payment by the party rated. . . . The Legislature, by bona fide payment, probably meant to exclude the gratuitous payment by a candidate.”

Well, I think that these quotations from these eminent Judges clearly settles what is the law with regard to this matter; and I want to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer why he proposes to change it. Has the law been found to be a bad law? It was passed through both Houses of Parliament without any division, and has remained uncomplained of and uncontested in both Houses of Parliament for the last sixteen years. I wish to know why, then, merely for the purpose of a large disfranchisement and exclusion, the present absolutely satisfactory condition of the law is to be objected to and interfered with. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board tells us now this measure will allow people to come in. I will tell him how it keeps them out. He blames the right hon. Member for South Lancashire for a proposal which has a line and which makes no moral selection whatever. What will the Bill of the Government do? It will give a vote to a man who lives in a hovel worth not more than £3 a year, if that man by any means pays his own rate in his own name, and it will exclude every man whose rental may be £8 or £9 value if he pays his rates through his landlord. I think there is a capriciousness in that which will be found most unsatisfactory. But let us leave for a moment the capriciousness with regard to the individual and see how it affects the town. The hon. and learned Member who sits just below me has made a speech to-night in favour of this Bill. He represents the town of Sheffield. Now it will be found that in that borough—I am not making allowances for the 30 or 50 per cent reductions—I am taking the gross numbers—it will be found that in the town of Sheffield this Bill would immediately give the chance of getting upon the register to not less than 28,334 persons—which, I believe, is 11 or 12 per cent of the whole number that immediately under this Bill—I mean in the first year of its operation—would have a chance of coming upon the register. But what does it do now in this respect with reference to the unfortunate town which I am permitted, in conjunction with my hon. Colleague, to represent in this House. Birmingham, as the House knows, is a town considerably larger than Sheffield. Like Sheffield, it is concerned chiefly in the manufacture of metals. I would say no more for Birmingham now than I have said for it before I represented it; but I say there is not in this kingdom a town whose population is more industrious, and has connected with their industry more intelligence than that of Birmingham. But what does this Bill do for the town of Birmingham? Why, it gives the chance of admission to the registry to 2,384 persons, and it excludes under the Small Tenements Act—[“No, no!”]—wait till I have finished my sentence—I say that it excludes, under the Small Tenements Act and under the various local Acts, not fewer than 36,177 persons. No! I know very well what hon. Gentlemen mean. They mean, of course, that to accommodate the capricious measure of the Government—and the caprice of that measure is in no degree essential to a sound measure of Reform—in order to accommodate themselves to the caprice of that Bill they must do something. But what are the people of Birmingham to do? They are to get rid of the Small Tenements Act in their various parishes, if they can make up their minds to that, and they are to come here in order to get Parliament to consent to a Bill to repeal their local rating Acts. Well now, I am not surprised that the Member for Sheffield or the Member for Oldham should think that as regards those particular spots with which they are principally connected there is something useful in this Bill. But I have a higher opinion of the people of Sheffield and of the people of Oldham than to believe that for the sake of a special advantage to them in this respect they would prefer that a Bill should be passed which would do such grievous injustice to Birmingham and to the great majority of the boroughs of the kingdom. Now, last night only, when this matter was under discussion, I had an opportunity of speaking to three gentlemen from Birmingham who came up to London on no matter connected with this debate; one of them being an eminent officer of the Chamber of Commerce, and another equally eminent in connection with the administration of the Poor Law affairs. I said to them: "Would it not be possible for you in Birmingham to so alter your position with regard to the question of compounding for rates that you could put yourselves in a short period in as satisfactory a position as the town of Sheffield?" They said that they believed it to be absolutely impossible. In that town the great majority of these 36,000, to whom I have just referred, have never paid poor rate—I am speaking of paying it directly—for it has not been the custom of the town to do so, and to ask them, for the sake of putting some of them upon the register, in accordance with the requirements of this capricious Bill—to ask them to destroy the whole fabric of the economic system connected with their poor rate is, I say, to ask them what this House has no right to ask them, and which we have no reason to expect would be complied with if we did ask. And I complain, and I think the House has a right to complain, and I think the Members for all the boroughs which are thus adversely affected have a right to complain, that a Bill has been introduced having this essential quality, that it must cause confusion in every borough, though it has not been shown, and it never can be shown, that the cause of that confusion is in the smallest degree necessary to the satisfactory settlement of the question of Reform. Now, the House in many cases proceeds very much upon precedent. It likes what is old, and when things are thirty years old they assume a certain aspect of respectability. I have a great regard for the Reform Act of 1832, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer sometimes speaks of it as if he had a great respect for it; and I am not sure now that he is not actuated in his present course by a sort of envy of Earl Russell. That noble Lord has a great historic name in connection with the Reform Act of 1832. The right hon. Gentleman hopes, perhaps, to become the great historic name connected with the Reform of 1867. But now the principle of the Reform Act is extremely simple—household suffrage, a building occupation in towns, limiting it by a value of £10. That defines exactly what is intended to be done. Well, nearly all the Bills which have been introduced since that time have been based upon almost the same principle. The Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire last year was based upon the principle of a £7 rental. Nothing could be more simple; and, as far as it went, it was felt in all parts of the country to be entirely clear and honest. But whilst that Bill, as the Reform Act did, defined clearly what it was intended to do, and could by no possibility deceive anybody, the present Bill, while capriciously proposing greatly to extend the franchise, does actually exclude multitudes of those who, if you touch this question at all, have a right that their demands shall be conceded. Well, the remedy which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire proposes is a remedy very much in accordance with the principles of the Bill of 1832 and of the Bill of last year. The right hon. Gentleman wants to establish a definite ground and a definite line, and to include the multitudes, or a considerable portion of them, that the Bill of the Government must necessarily exclude. Now, suppose I put this to the Members of the Government who are really anxious, as I am anxious, that this matter should be settled within the framework of this Bill. Suppose that this point that we are now discussing were settled—that the personal rating were abandoned—that its great exclusion was felt to be unjust, and was given up—that it was thought better to offer something distinct and definite to the approbation and acceptance of the people. Well, then, in that case we should have to determine what the franchise should be, and it must be one of two things. If the personal rating were given up, it must either be household suffrage pure and simple, or it must be some line—it does not follow it should be the line fixed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire—but it must be some line above which at present the franchise should be given to everybody, and below which at present, and it may be for another thirty years for anything that I know, the franchise should not be extended. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire has proposed in this clause a £5 rating franchise, and the President of the Poor Law Board has made very merry, and expressed the utmost astonishment that there should be an addition to that clause, by which it is proposed that, as a rule, wherever the variation in the rating is so great as to be manifest in defeating the object of the House and the Bill—that where the real clear annual value was £6 or £6 5s.—that in that case the suffrage should also be given. And the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman really comes to this: that it would have, as near as I can judge, exactly the same effect in extending the franchise as if the House were to adopt the proposition of the Bill of 1860, and give to the country a £6 rental franchise. I am not going to chaffer about this matter. I believe honestly that whether the line of rating was drawn at £4 with the rental at £5, or the line of rating at £5 with the rental at £6, that either of these measures would be a better measure for the country, far more satisfactory, and would form a far surer settlement of this question than the Bill as it is now before the House. I believe that, because it would be honest and equal. This Bill is not equal, and if it is not equal it cannot be called honest. I believe more—that the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire would include within the electoral lists more completely and fully all those that the House proposes to take in, which is the best paid and the most intelligent of the working classes of the kingdom. Now, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he was making a speech in favour of his Bill, on the second reading, in 1859, made use of an observation or two, which, I think, he has been just now putting into practice. He said—

“I am perfectly aware of all the tricks of management by which you can deal with the borough franchise.”

He said further—

“How you can manage to appear to be doing a very liberal act, and yet keep out of the franchise the very class for which so many persons express so much sympathy?”

He says, and I dare say it is true, “I have all these plans in my pigeon-holes, and could have availed myself of them with perfect impunity.” I dare say the noble Lord the Member for Stamford, if he were at liberty to explain his explanation, might probably tell us how many of those curiosities from the pigeon-holes of the right hon. Gentleman have been laid before the Cabinet; but I suppose, after fingering them all over, and seeing which would be the likeliest to suit his purpose, the right hon. Gentleman saw that this after all was the cleverest dodge, and he had the not altogether absurd notion that there were Gentlemen on this side of the House, enthusiastic Reformers, who might be caught by a proposition of this kind. Now, Sir, there are Gentlemen here who think that through this Bill they will get household suffrage. I understand the Member for Glasgow (Mr. Dalglish) and some of his friends are of that opinion, and they think they will get it—not now; but that this Bill is so unpleasant, so unjust, so insulting to those whom it excludes, that it will establish what is called a raw on the public feeling, and the public conscience, and that from the very hour when the first register is made up under this Bill, there will be an incessant and irritating agitation in every one of the boroughs on which it does not now confer household suffrage. That such must be the result is the opinion of some of my Friends at this end of the House. Well, Sir, these Gentlemen have not been remarkable for their activity in the Reform agitation. I know not whether the hon. Member for Glasgow and some others may have any intention to take to what in America is called the “stump,” and fight this question at great public meetings throughout the country. If they have, all I can say is I hope they may find progress on this question to demand very much less labour than I have found it to demand from me during the last ten years. But now let us consider the question of household suffrage. I have always during the ten years for which I have discussed the question been in favour of household suffrage as the basis of the borough franchise; but I am bound to admit that three-fourths of those near me are not in favour of household suffrage. I doubt extremely if all the Members on the other side were to leave the House, and leave the determination to Gentlemen on this side, I greatly doubt whether it would be carried by a vote among Gentlemen on this side of the House. That being so, I am of the opinion that it is not a wise or statesmanlike policy to take a measure partly because it is bad, and because you hope its badness will be so unpleasant to the public that you hope they will rise against it and in the very next Parliament will batter at these doors and ask this House again to obstruct all its business and all its legislation in order to deal with the question you now leave unsettled. And let me tell those hon. Gentlemen this, that when the time does come that these restrictions can no longer be maintained—and that it will come I shall take no pains to deny or even to question—but when that time does come, the House of Commons will take the very step then which the right hon. Member for South Lancashire asks it to take now. It will not grant household suffrage pure and simple. It will say, as I have said before, and with reason—because, do not suppose I have no sense of what is good, and honest, and independent, and pure, in a constituency—the House will say then, as I have said before and repeat now, that it is not for the advantage of the constituencies and not for the advantage of the poorest and most dependent amongst them, but greatly to their disadvantage, that they should be placed in a condition of constant temptation by being added to the electoral roll. And therefore though I have been, and am now, in favour of household suffrage as the basis of the franchise, still I believe it would be wise—and I am afraid our population will not have so much improved by that time as to make it then unwise—to draw the line a little above the pure and simple household suffrage. [“No, no!”] I do not know who the Gentleman is who calls out “No!” I have discussed this question as much as any man in England; I have thought as much as any man about it; I have as large an interest in its being settled now, and settled well, as any other man to whom I am speaking. If you except the interest of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire in being historically connected with the question, I might put my historical connection with it above that of most hon. Gentlemen in this House. Though the hon. Gentleman calls out “No, no,” I believe you might have settled this question by a low line, and I would recommend now a line somewhat lower than that of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire. In my own Bill of 1858, I proposed that the line should be drawn at the £3 rate or £4 rental. In speaking on that subject three weeks ago I said it was not necessary, if the House came to any unanimous or general conclusion, that we should make a fight for the sake of a pound in this matter; but I believe we might settle it on the principle of removing all this irritation on which hon. Gentlemen near me are calculating for going down to pure and simple household suffrage, by giving a very large and generous suffrage to the inhabitants of every town, so that in the lifetime of the very youngest man in this House any larger extension of the franchise in boroughs would never be demanded. I believe that this evening some Gentleman said he thought if it were not for the party spirit which perhaps necessarily but often unfortunately comes to mix in our debates—the Chancellor of the Exchequer I believe approves of it, except when it interferes with his own projects—if it were not for this party feeling we might easily settle this matter. The Government has brought in a certain measure. Gentlemen behind them, of course, support them—they would have supported it if it had been anything else—and some are enthusiastic, if that be not too strong a figure of speech as applied to such a measure. It is a strange figure of speech to say that any man could be enthusiastic about such a measure. But at least the President of the Poor Law Board is enthusiastic, for he made to-night the most stirring and energetic speech yet delivered in its favour. Yet not long since we all know his Colleagues, Lord Carnarvon and the right hon. Member for Huntingdon and the rest of them, unanimously agreed upon a £6 rating suffrage. What, then, can be more preposterous than that the President of the Poor Law Board should speak for nearly an hour—I am speaking of only a portion of his speech—in utter condemnation of that proposition. The right hon. Member for South Lancashire has expressed a lingering regret on his side that that Bill disappeared, and some persons not very fair in their interpretation of what he said, have spoken as if he wished for a £6 rating suffrage; but everyone who recollects what took place last year must know that that is quite impossible. The right hon. Gentleman, however, expressed a lingering regret that it had not come on for fair discussion in the House, because it was plain and intelligible; there were no dodges about it. No doubt he thought it was a question of a single figure, and as it was not one of those ingenious measures which emerged from the pigeon-holes of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he thought the figure might be altered from 6 to 5 or 4, so that we might agree on a measure which might have given some hopes of settling the borough franchise on a reasonable basis. I take it that the President of the Poor Law Board imposes on the House when he tells us that he has a great horror of the absurd and mischievous line which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire proposes to draw. May I tell the Committee what is my opinion of them at this moment? I believe a majority of the House have come to the opinion, so frankly expressed by the hon. Baronet the Member for Oxford University, and other Members on that side, that whatever may be our likings or dislikings, we must bow to the great public opinion of the nation, and that of 4,000,000 or 5,000,000 of our fellow-countrymen. The right hon. Gentleman taunts me with what I have said, but there are 4,000,000 or 5,000,000, and if you did not know that and believe it I think you would not be where you are now with respect to this measure. The great majority of this House are in favour of what last year and for some years past would have been considered a very liberal extension of the franchise. I think you are all sensible that the House would be more respected, and the country would be stronger and more energetic, if 300,000 or 400,000 more voters were added to the electoral roll. If that be so, why should it not be done? Give something generously and distinctly. I do not think there is anything in the world that so offends the common sense and right feeling of a people—I am not speaking of society—as the attempt to play them any trick, the attempt to offer them as a great concession that which really, as it is presented to them, is hardly any concession at all; and I am satisfied it is a great misfortune to this question, to the House, and to the country, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his anxiety to settle this matter, has tried to avoid every step of his predecessors, and in his attempt to do something original has been by no means wise. Now, I have said that I am for household suffrage, and if the right hon. Gentleman would accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Oldham, I would not divide the House against him; and I think that on this particular point the Government ought to yield. With respect to this particular plan of the Government, the right hon. Gentleman, the Chancellor of the Exchequer asked our advice, and the very first moment that we propose to give it, he says we are treating him unkindly. He says we are acting in a party spirit if we respond to his invitation and tell him we believe a certain mode of extending the franchise is better than his. I say with most perfect honesty that if I had been sitting on that side of the House, and if the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire had been Leader of the House and had prepared a measure like this, I believe that I have not uttered a single syllable against this measure that I should not have uttered against that of my right hon. Friend. In fact, I have gone far beyond the question of party in this matter; and I should congratulate the Chancellor of the Exchequer with all my heart if it should be his lot to settle this question for the next fifty years upon a broad and generous foundation. If he should succeed in doing so it will make amends for the many mistakes of his political career, especially of the last twenty years. I am satisfied that many Members on this side of the House, I believe the majority of them, now honestly, without any drawback or reservation whatever, wish the right hon. Gentleman to accommodate his Bill to what I believe to be the real opinion not only of those on this side of the House, but also of the majority on the other side of the House. Because, bear in mind, that when on a great question like this opinions have so changed and have so advanced that the barriers of party have been thrown down, and we come with minds unclouded and unfettered to the consideration of this subject, I hold it to be absolutely impossible that there can be on this side of the House a majority of men who believe that the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer is the wisest that can be made; a proposition which gives 28,000 new electors to Sheffield and excludes 36,000 in the borough of Birmingham. Now, Sir, I have no more to say than this: I know nothing at all of the figures of the coming division; I have not a dream nor an idea of what is to be the result of the division of to-night. I wish we could have no division, and that the Government could put their Bill into a shape that would meet the wishes of the vast majority; but whatever that division may lead to, I state this with the utmost frankness and conscientiousness, that I have not taken a step in regard to this Bill, or said a single word in connection with it, but what has been prompted by an honest and most earnest wish that now at this moment, at this supreme hour of this question, it should be grappled with with the wisdom of statesmanship, and that the measure should be offered the great body of the people with that generosity which I hope belongs, at bottom, to all the great statesmen of this country.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Mr. Dodson—Sir, although we are in Committee upon the Bill of the Representation of the People there are really two policies before the House to-night on the most important portion of that measure. Although we may be formally called upon to amend the Bill which I have had the honour to introduce, we are really considering upon the borough franchise a contrary policy and a counter proposition. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire proposed to draw what has been literally and truly described as a hard and fast line, beneath which no person is to possess the privilege of a vote or to aim at the franchise. On the other hand, we have proposed a measure in which every inhabitant of a house, subject to conditions which are in harmony with the habits and manners of the country, which I think are approved by the rational discrimination of the people, should possess that franchise, and, at the same time, instead of drawing this hard and fast line, we have said to all those who are not now in a position to avail themselves of the privilege thus offered them by the proposed law, "We will take care that you shall have an opportunity, if you deserve it, of acquiring the right and enjoying it." Now, these are the two schemes for the settlement of the borough franchise for the consideration of the Committee to-night, for it would have been worse than idle to limit our discussion to the few and scanty words that will be formally put by Mr. Dodson for the decision of the Committee. We must take the bundle of Amendments suddenly put upon the paper by the right hon. Gentleman opposite as descriptive of the whole scheme, and that is the same scheme which was indicated by the Instruction relinquished by the hon. and learned Member for Exeter. Now, Sir, to the proposition we have made for establishing the borough franchise upon a rated household franchise, to be enjoyed by the occupier on personally paying the rate, the right hon. Gentleman has offered two main objections. He tells us, in the first place, that the principle of rating as thus applied is newfangled and alien. That surprises me, for I thought that the principle of rating was one which was consecrated by the manners and customs of this country, that it was a very ancient custom, and even in a great degree that it was one to be traced to a remote period in connection with the enjoyment of civil and political rights. It is recognised by the common law; it is recognised by the statute law of past generations, and in the age in which we live it has formed a part and portion of one of the most famous laws connected with our political history—the Reform Act of 1832. In many subsequent Acts and in many other public documents of great authority and authenticity which have been brought forward by able statesmen, this principle now described as alien and newfangled, has been adopted as the basis and chief guarantee of the arrangements proposed, and Parliament has always welcomed and sanctioned these propositions and these arrangements. Therefore, I have been somewhat astonished that the law of rating, or rather the principle of rating, should be described by the right hon. Gentleman as alien and newfangled. The second objection to the proposition of the Government made by the right hon. Gentleman is that it is of too exclusive a character. That objection is scarcely consistent with many observations subsequently made by him, and with many inferences which he afterwards drew, and with many conclusions which his friends approved and cheered, all of which seemed to express and intimate to the House that the Government measure was of a very revolutionary and dangerous character. But, according to the right hon. Gentleman, the principal objection to that measure is that its character is too exclusive. Now, I humbly think that in settling the basis of our borough franchise, the House is not to consider what the operation of the principle that we propose may immediately be, whether it is of too exclusive or too expansive a character, but whether the principle is a just principle, and whether it is one which, if adopted, will in practice generally and ultimately bring about a satisfactory state of things. Now, Sir, if this be the objection made to our scheme of establishing the franchise upon the principle of the personal payment of rates, there are also objections which are offered to the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman, which is founded upon a hard limitation—and the great objection to that is, I think, that the hard line he has proposed is one that really offers no settlement of the question. Although I listened with great attention to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman—and, indeed, I have listened with the deepest interest to all the speeches that have been made upon this subject this evening, and especially to that which has just closed—I have never heard a single argument offered to show that by adopting the principle of a certain figure, which we will assume, from the other Amendments of the right hon. Gentleman, to be £5, we shall have any security for a settlement, nor has any reason been offered us why, if adopted, it should not immediately be disturbed, and why agitation should not be immediately fomented in order to again alter the settlement come to. This is a point that has been evaded throughout this discussion. And yet, allow me to remind the Committee, this is the most material point we have to consider. It may be convenient that, in explaining to the Committee the reasons that have induced us to make our present proposal, I should recall the attention of the Committee to what occurred in the year 1859. In that year we had to consider the question of Parliamentary Reform, and, of course, the borough franchise, which was one of the most important portions of the scheme, engaged our immediate attention, and the result of our consideration of the subject was that it was impossible, with any prospect of satisfaction, to disturb the £10 franchise established in 1832, and which now prevails; for that if we came to a rental of £8 or a rating of £7 or of £6, there was no standpoint upon which we could rely, and that useless agitation for a further change must be the only consequence. We then arrived at the conclusion that it was absolutely necessary—I am now speaking of 1859—to leave it untouched, or to proceed to a point at which we should probably deal with it, something after the fashion of our present proposition. We took every adequate means of ascertaining the opinion of the country on the subject, and we were convinced from the information which reached us from all quarters that any attempt to diminish considerably the £10 franchise in boroughs was perfectly impossible. So great was the influence, and so determined was the spirit at that time of the borough constituencies of England, that any effort of the kind must have entirely failed. We therefore, in the discharge of our duty, felt that the only course which was left to us to pursue was to recommend Parliament not to deal with the borough franchise, and we, accordingly, attempted to attain the end of introducing some portion of the working classes into the constituencies—which we desired to do—by other means. But what happened under these circumstances? We met with very great opposition to the policy which we recommended, and which subsequent years proved to be accurate and sound. Hon. Gentlemen opposite called for a reduction of the borough franchise, and no person was more active in the matter than the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne. That right hon. Gentleman was at the time one of the most busy managers in organizing the opposition which was to force the Government to reduce the borough franchise. Well, Sir, the opposition was successful. A Resolution was passed which destroyed our Government, but which inflicted, I believe, more damage on the Liberal party than almost any step which they have taken. Then the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne—who was not at the time a right hon. Gentleman, but who immediately became one—was promoted to a high post in the Government.

MR. LOWE: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon, I was a right honourable then.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The right hon. Gentleman will, I believe, not contradict me when I say that he was at the time of which I am speaking at once preferred to a high post in the Government.

MR. LOWE: I was Vice President of the Board of Trade in the former Liberal Government, and Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education in the next.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I may be permitted to explain to the Committee why it is I have made the observations which have just fallen from me. No one has ever imputed to the right hon. Gentleman that he was actuated by any improper motives in the course which he pursued in 1859. It never entered our minds that because the right hon. Gentleman opposed our Bill and supported a policy then which he has since denounced, and he afterwards attained a high post, that he was in any way influenced by improper motives. Yet, the other evening, when my right hon. Friend the Secretary for India expressed, in a manner worthy the integrity of his character, and with a sincerity which no one could have doubted, the motives by which his conduct on this question had been dictated, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne did not hesitate to rise in his place and to impute to him an outrageous change of opinion, connecting that change with his preferment to high office. Under these circumstances, I am, I think, justified in reminding the right hon. Gentleman, who is very ready to criticize, but not very well disposed to bear criticism, that he should sometimes reflect a little before he makes such observations as these, and indulge in some reminiscence of his own past career. But to return to the subject more immediately under discussion. It is sometimes said that in the proposal which we make with a view to the settlement of the borough franchise, that we are interfering with, or, rather, that we are not doing justice to the compound-householders, who, according to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, are the creation of the civilization of the age. Now, I will not enter into any controversy on that subject. It was not only the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire but the hon. Member for Birmingham who thus described the Rating Acts which have produced such anomalous results. There are, however, other views entertained of those Acts than that they are the result of the civilization of the age. There are some who think that jobbing vestries, rapacious landlords, and indigent tenants may have given rise to the necessity for such legislation. We all know very well that those Acts were passed at a period which was not particularly distinguished for public spirit. Even the Small Tenements Act, which is the most recent of them, would, in the opinion of many, probably not have passed in the age in which we live. And I cannot believe, when we are laying down, on principles which I hope will prove permanent, the foundation of so high a privilege as that of electoral right, that we are to be scared from the constitutional course before us, or from taking a part that we approve of by the shadow and phantom of those Rating Acts. I cannot help thinking that if we legislate in the spirit which Her Majesty's Government recommend, and if this Bill is allowed to pass into law, many of the inconveniences which you now foresee will, as a necessary consequence, disappear. The men to whom this measure will open the franchise will,

it seems to me, be actuated by higher motives than those for which you give them credit, will adapt themselves to the altered circumstances with which they will have to deal, and will not allow their rights to depend on any mere accidental arrangement. If our principles be sound those men will assert their sway, and will overcome those difficulties in their path on which you now so much dwell. What we have attempted in the new clause which we have laid on the table will very much soften and mitigate, even by the confession of the right hon. Gentleman opposite himself, those difficulties; and if our proposals be inconvenient in their character, and would tend to unjust consequences, would not similar inconveniences, I would ask, be experienced by that multitude which would be admitted under the fixed, hard line which the right hon. Gentleman himself proposes? Surely, under that £5 line there would be many more thousands of compound-householders or quasi-compound-householders by whom great inconvenience would have been endured than could be by possibility inconvenienced by our arrangement. Throughout this discussion that view of the case has been entirely omitted. Two things are always assumed—that under the £5 line no one who might fairly aspire to the franchise would be excluded from its exercise, and that with all the openings which we offer to the compound-householders not one of them will avail himself of the privilege placed within his reach. Can any one really believe that that would be the case? Under our Bill you will get all those men whom you say you wish to get on the register. If there be men who take no interest in the acquisition of political privileges, of course, they will not exert themselves to obtain them, and it is not desirable that they should, because persons without any decided character, or entirely engrossed in the lowest pursuits of life, with no wish to improve their condition, are not those who would reflect credit on the electoral body. That, however, is not, in my opinion, a just description of the majority of our countrymen, and if you do keep out many men who may not qualify themselves for the franchise under the constitutional conditions which we propose, who may be indigent, of a wandering character, or wanting in all those civil virtues of industry and order which you are anxious to promote, what harm will be done? Your object is to obtain the worthy, and if the unworthy are alone

excluded we can do no harm. Then it is said, what are these securities—you cannot for a moment hope that they will continue to exist. There will be a great agitation against them. What, then, will be your position? It really is a mistake to call those checks and securities; and if you want to know what is to preserve and guard these securities, I will tell you why they will not be impugned. If you want to keep those securities, as you call them, in vigorous existence, you will be able best to do so by means of the people who by submitting to the conditions which we impose, in order to acquire the privileges which we throw open to them, will constitute their most effectual safeguard. When they find that by the personal payment of rates and by residence in a town for a certain time they can secure for themselves the franchise they will be disposed to look with extreme jealousy on those who do not conform to those conditions, and who do not lead those regular lives being placed in the same position. What has happened since the rate-paying clauses of the Reform Bill of 1832 received the sanction of Parliament? Agitation against them has prevailed. Demagogues have made use of those clauses as a subject on which to excite the country. There have been organized operations in certain towns against those clauses. They have, nevertheless, not been abolished, because the common sense of the great majority of the people who pay rates under those conditions has resolved to maintain them, inasmuch as they are barriers against those who may otherwise without pains attempt to share their privileges. Therefore, Sir, I think that that charge against what are called the securities is perfectly fallacious, that it is formed in ignorance of our countrymen, and that there is no foundation for any apprehension that if the franchise is granted on these conditions, these conditions will not be observed and guarded, and will not be observed and guarded by the very persons who, by submitting to those conditions, obtain the privileges which they prize. Then the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Exeter made some remarkable observations with regard to this particular topic. He told us that no one could be a stronger advocate than he was for household suffrage; but the misfortune was that the country was not yet prepared for it, and having thus favoured us with the moral of his political creed he indulged in a criticism upon this measure and said, "These restrictions which you are proposing will ultimately break down, and then you will have household suffrage." But how inconsistent is the criticism with the creed. The hon. and learned Gentleman looks upon household suffrage as the perfection of policy, and regrets that the country is not yet prepared for such a measure; and surely, therefore, when a scheme is brought forward which for a certain time prevents household suffrage coming into operation in consequence of restrictions which in time will cease and break down, the hon. and learned Gentleman ought to congratulate us upon our wise and consummate policy in framing a temporary arrangement which will allow the country to enjoy to a certain degree household suffrage till it is prepared for it to the full extent. Well, Sir, there was one observation made by my noble Friend the Member for Stamford (Viscount Cranbourne) which certainly was severe upon the measure which we propose; but it appeared to me that my noble Friend proved too much. The arguments employed by my noble Friend were certainly very good arguments against the Bill; but they were no less arguments against all constitutional government. My noble Friend said, "You are increasing the suffrage, you are lowering the franchise, you are conferring power on the multitude. We know what will happen. You will have electioneering agents and a variety of political combinations who will avail themselves of the materials you have supplied them with, and the consequences to society will be most dangerous. You will have agitating leaders and all kinds of confederacies." It is all very true. Demagogues and agitators are very unpleasant, and leagues and registers may be very inconvenient, but they are incident to a free and constitutional country, and you must put up with these inconveniences or do without many important advantages. The arguments of my noble Friend, therefore, are not, I think, so much directed against this Bill as against any scheme which would extend political privileges to any portion of the nation. Now, Sir, I shall not notice some remarks made by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Stoke-upon-Trent, because he evidently expected that I was going to make a very elaborate reply to what he said. I assure him that I listened with the greatest pleasure to the invectives which he delivered against myself. His style is greatly ornamental to discussion, but it requires practice. And so far as my hon. Friend displayed his talents to-night, I listened with the greatest satisfaction. All his exhibitions in this House are distinguished by a prudery which charms me, and when he talks of Asian mysteries I may, perhaps, by way of reply, remark that there is a Batavian grace about his exhibition which takes the sting out of what he has said. Now, Sir, perhaps I may be allowed to put before the House what I believe to be an impartial account of the relation of the Government to the House with respect to their Reform Bill. First of all, then, I would notice our relations with the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone). Now the right hon. Gentleman opposite is a candidate for power, and no man has a greater right to be a candidate for power. The right hon. Gentleman is an opponent with whom any man may be proud to have to contend. I know nothing more legitimate than the ambition of such a man, and I am sure I bear the right hon. Gentleman no ill-will, or as little ill-will as a man can bear, for the efforts which he may make to change his position and to cross from one side of the House to the other. But I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will not be offended if I, without passion, but I am sure clearly express to the House, what I believe to be his position with regard to the Government and this question. I can quite understand how the right hon. Gentleman should be so very emulous to deal with this important question with which Her Majesty's Government have felt it their duty to grapple; but the right hon. Gentleman seems to forget, what he ought to remember. The right hon. Gentleman has had his innings. He has dealt with the subject of Parliamentary Reform very recently, and in this House—in this House elected under the auspices of a Government of which he was a Member—and he introduced a measure with the advantage which we have never had, of being supported by a large majority. I do not begrudge the right hon. Gentleman those advantages; but I may still remind him of them, and I say under these circumstances we have a right to expect from the right hon. Gentleman that there should be no great eagerness to make party attacks. I cannot but view the Amendments proposed by the right hon. Gentleman in this light. They are not Amendments to our Bill. They are counter propositions. Now, some remarks were made with reference to a letter—the character of which was evidently entirely misunderstood by the hon. Gentleman who made those remarks. The letter was not addressed to the House of Commons, but to those with whom I am accustomed to act in public life. It was exactly such a letter as hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House are constantly in the habit of receiving. It may be described as a monosyllabic word, the instrument with which the races of Nemea have been won. The right hon. Gentleman suddenly placed upon the paper a declaration of war to the knife, and it was thought desirable that our Friends should be addressed, not in the usual hand but by my own, because it was thought that that fact would, perhaps, induce them to read the letter they received. I acknowledge the right hon. Gentleman's position and talents—that he is perfectly justified in attacking the Government; but do not let us misunderstand the motive or the conduct of the right hon. Gentleman. Nothing can be more legitimate. It is a party attack, and the endeavour to parry it as a party attack is in accordance with the tactics which were understood to be adopted in the House on this subject. But as regards the House of Commons, generally speaking, I wish, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, whatever may be the decision to-night, whatever may be the consequences of this division, to say that in dealing with this question Her Majesty's Government have never for a moment swerved from those sentiments which, with the full concurrence and desire of my Colleagues, I have often expressed in this House—namely, that we are most anxious to co-operate with the House in bringing this question of Parliamentary Reform to a satisfactory settlement, and although we could not swerve with respect to the borough franchise from those principles which we regarded as vital—namely, personal payment of rates and residence—still, with regard to almost every other point which has been mentioned in our discussion, we are most anxious, in Committee, after a fair deliberation, and after an interchange of opinion, to adopt that course which the House in its wisdom may think most expedient and desirable. The right hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) have expressed some astonishment at the course which the Government were pursuing, after the concessions they had made. Now, Sir, I and my Colleagues are conscious of the heavy task we have undertaken, and how much we must depend upon the assistance of the House in order to bring it to a happy conclusion ; but I confess, that I really am at a loss to understand what are the concessions which the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends have made us. I have been accused one night of giving up everything, and on the next of never having given up anything at all. I know very well that there was an important point—not a fundamental principle, but still an important point—in our original plan which I relinquished at the general desire of both sides of the House, and particularly at the desire of my own Friends, there is no doubt about that ; but that was a concession from the Government. However, I am sure we shall be most grateful for any concessions which we may receive ; but, at the present time, we are not conscious that such gifts have been bestowed on us. Now, whatever the course of this division, I wish the House thoroughly to understand what have been from the first and are now the feelings of the Government with reference to this Bill. As far as the borough franchise is concerned, I must repeat, at the risk of wearying the House, what I have said from the first, that the franchise in our plan is founded upon principles from which we cannot swerve. And the House has always in its discussions accepted that ; nor is it a novelty when we say that personal payment of rates and residence are the only conditions upon which we consent to this arrangement of the borough franchise. But I have in my mind no other point of this description at present. It would require a considerable amount of time to form an opinion on the immense number and great variety of Amendments, suggestions, and propositions upon the paper at the present moment ; but if I and my Colleagues had an opportunity, we would consider all those Amendments and propositions which hon. Gentlemen have placed upon the paper during the holidays with a most anxious desire to change and modify and adapt them to any practical course which may be consistent with the general principle of our measure, and we are perfectly prepared to meet the House in that spirit. We have been told that the lodger franchise has been conceded. The right hon. Gentleman says, “I have pledged myself to introduce a lodger franchise,” but really I am obliged to correct him, because I have not pledged myself, and for a very good reason. I believe that to introduce such a lodger franchise as would satisfy the House and the country is one of the most difficult things in the world. All I did say was, and I was careful in saying it, that if a sensible and well-considered proposition were brought forward we would candidly meet it, and I am sure that if it were established in argument it would be adopted by the House. But I have had a great many communications upon the question of the lodger franchise, and every day I find more difficulty in the subject. I find it a very difficult subject. The right hon. Gentleman who makes so much of the lodger franchise, must himself be conscious, after being reminded of his language last year, when he was so very strong in his expressions, and informed the House that it was a small matter which chiefly concerned the middle classes—the right hon. Gentleman must himself feel, on reflection, that the matter is not so easy as he has stated. I have received many deputations of late, and among them has been one from a society which is very much under the patronage of the hon. Member for Birmingham—the Reform League. The members of that deputation spoke to me upon the subject of the lodger franchise, and so far as I can recollect, though my noble Friend (Lord Stanley), who was with me, will correct me if I am in error, I distinctly understood from them that they wanted a lodger franchise. But when I asked what residence and value should be the qualification, they looked upon the observation as an insult ; so that was not at all encouraging. Many hon. Gentlemen are as well informed as I am on this matter ; but I say this is very valuable information to the Minister or Member who is projecting a lodger franchise, which is peculiarly for the working classes, and especially for the working classes in London. If value and rating are not to be admitted as qualifications to a lodger franchise, because they would be an insult, I hardly hope we shall be able to carry a lodger franchise such as would meet with the views of all. But let the proposition be made ; let it be brought forward by any Gentleman who is thoroughly master of the subject and can bring it fairly before the House, and he will find from me a kind reception for the lodger franchise, and I shall be very glad if he can succeed in bringing forward a proposition satisfactory to the country and the

House. Then with regard to the county franchise and other points upon which questions have been put to me across the House—I object to settling matters of that kind by question and answer across the House, without the advantage of discussion. Take the question of the compounders; gentlemen rise and ask, do you intend to do this or that? I must answer that the question of the compound-householder is one of great difficulty which requires much debating; and the speeches which have been delivered to-night must have convinced the House that it is a question which demanded complete discussion in Committee. Again, I have been asked what we mean to do with the proposition of voting-papers; I reply that we wish to consult the feeling of the House of Commons upon that matter; and if the House thinks fairly of this and other points, I shall, with the consent of my Colleagues, redeem the pledge which I gave, and give those points the consideration they deserve. But, above all, let us have fair discussion and deliberation; that is the spirit in which Her Majesty's Government wish to treat this question with regard to the House. It is a disagreeable thing to distinguish between the House generally and the right hon. Gentleman opposite, to whom I always wish, as the head of a party, to pay every honour; but this is a subject of a peculiar character; it has gone through peculiar phases already during the course of this year, and it is my duty to distinguish between the House generally and the right hon. Gentleman, though he is the Leader of the party, because between the House and the Government upon this question of Parliamentary Reform there was an understanding that we were mutually to co-operate, and by mutual confidence and co-operation to bring about if we could a fair measure of Reform. That is the undertaking which I on the part of my Colleagues am perfectly ready to fulfil, and to none of the suggestions which hon. Gentlemen opposite have put upon the paper will we refuse the most ample consideration. We will give them all the consideration they deserve, with the anxious desire to adapt and so modify them as to chime in with the principles of our Bill. But when the right hon. Gentleman comes forward suddenly with a counter proposition to the main proposals of the Government it is impossible for me to close my eyes to the nature of that movement; I must say to the right hon. Gentleman that I cannot in any way agree to the propositions he has made; they would entirely alter and would completely supersede the policy which we recommend the House to adopt; and therefore I trust the right hon. Gentleman will clearly understand that in the distinction which I have made that I have not done it merely in the heat of debate, for I feel in no heat at this moment. I think, on the eve of an important division, that there should be a clear and honest understanding between the Government and the House of Commons upon this matter of the Reform Bill. We have acted entirely in conformity with our representations to the House; we believe we have experienced from hon. Gentlemen true candour and generous consideration, and we are anxious at this moment cordially to co-operate with the House of Commons in the settlement of this question.

MR. GLADSTONE: I have no complaint whatever to make of the latter part of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, in which he has referred so largely to myself, either in point of courtesy or of candour; and with regard, in particular, to one especial assurance which he conveyed that it was from no personal ill-will that he entered upon the subject, I venture in return to assure him that I listened to the declaration with feelings of most implicit belief. The right hon. Gentleman and I have often been in sharp conflict; it is possible that we may be in sharp conflict again, but at no period, as is well known to my friends, have I ever charged him or suspected him of being actuated by feelings of personal animosity. Having thus, I hope satisfactorily, disposed of the explanation as regards me personally, I hope I may be permitted to comment upon the singular declarations that have proceeded from the right hon. Gentleman. He says he has had a clear understanding with the House, and that he has given explicit assurances to the House, and that by those assurances he is bound to entertain fairly and to consider candidly any suggestions that he may receive from Members of the House provided they do not proceed from the head of the party of Opposition. Now, Sir, I do not for a moment question the title of the right hon. Gentleman to decline to entertain any suggestion proceeding from myself. But the right hon. Gentleman, if he chooses to dignify me with the title, of which I am very unworthy, of Leader of the Opposition in this House, must know that I do not hold that post by my own choice, and that if there be one post in this country which more than another is only to be held by the free voice of those who are concerned it is that. Therefore, I confess that after the candid statement of the right hon. Gentleman I am at a loss to perceive in what sense it is that, addressing himself to those who sit upon these Benches, and who are supposed by the public outside of these walls to be a party composed of the majority of the House—to be a party capable of directing its proceedings—I do not, I say, well understand in what sense it is that the right hon. Gentleman proposes to fulfil his pledges to that portion of the Members of this House by declaring that he is ready to entertain their suggestions, provided none of these suggestions are offered through the person whom they may honour with their choice. [“No!”] Well, Sir, if I have misunderstood the right hon. Gentleman, I own I am entirely at a loss to divine the meaning of those remarkable sentences—not to be mistaken or easily forgotten—in which he drew his broad and clear distinction between myself and the Members on this side of the House. However, Sir, I thank the right hon. Gentleman for that, as for every candid declaration. Perhaps I feel with him that what is now going on may throw great light upon the subject which he has opened, and may serve to show me at least how far it is in my power to contribute anything or nothing at all to the settlement of Parliamentary Reform in the position which I hold. Sir, the right hon. Gentleman says this is a party attack; and it is not unnatural that his friends should cheer that declaration on his part. But I want to know what we are to do in a case in which we approach the discussion of an important portion of the right hon. Gentleman’s Bill, and we find ourselves separated, by all the precedents of our conduct, and by our deep conviction, from the principle on which he proposes to proceed. In what manner, I want to know, are we to give effect to our convictions other than that which he calls laying before the House a counter-proposition, and why, if we so lay before the House a counter-proposition, is it to be assumed by the right hon. Gentleman that conviction on our part has nothing to do with the matter, and that that which we really aim at is to give effect to our eager anxiety to drive him from office? Sir, I must say this, that charges of this kind ought at all times to be lightly borne by public men. But I think that we who quitted office in the month of last June, at a time when we well knew that a majority of this House were desirous that we should retain it, we, of all other men, may receive that imputation, not, indeed, with the scorn with which the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board abounds. [“No!”] Are Gentlemen aware that I am quoting the expression of the right hon. Gentleman himself? Not, indeed, I say with the scorn with which the President of the Poor Law Board abounds. [An hon. MEMBER: He does not abound with it!] I thank the hon. Member for his interruption and contradiction; but I had the advantage of hearing the President of the Poor Law Board in a very able speech, and as I hope the time of the House will not be wasted in idle altercation of this kind about scorn abounding or not abounding, I shall merely say we may receive such imputations as those to which I was referring with a modest yet very firm denial. Well, the right hon. Gentleman challenges what he calls my plan, which he says I have laid before the House. And I would say a few words on the assumption that it is before the House. He holds that it is impossible by drawing a hard line to settle this question; and in his historical review he wishes to deprive me of any advantage which I could obtain from his own authority. He tells us that in 1859 the Government of Lord Derby advisedly came to the conclusion that they could not venture to recommend such a line, and, consequently, they did not propose a lowering of the borough franchise; but has the right hon. Gentleman forgotten that, in 1859, after the General Election, while he was yet in office, and when the question of retaining office depended, as he thought, upon his words, he came forward in the place which he now occupies and declared his readiness to lower the borough franchise? Or, if the right hon. Gentleman’s memory extends only to that portion of 1859 that went before the election, and not to that which followed it, has he forgotten what happened only six weeks ago, when, proposing from that Bench a Bill for the settlement of the question of Parliamentary Reform, he did lower the franchise to a certain figure, and he did tell us also this, that although our plan of last year had been founded only on an expedient, the plan which he then proposed differed from ours, inasmuch as his plan for lowering the borough franchise was founded on a principle? Surely, the right hon. Gentleman must count upon the shortness of our memories with extraordinary confidence if he thinks that arguments and statements of that kind can weigh with the House? The right hon. Gentleman has, however, set before us pretty clearly the position in which we stand with reference to the important portion of the Bill which concerns the borough franchise. And, so far, I do not understand him to draw distinctions between other Members of the House and myself. I do assure him that if I could believe that he does not object to anything in this proposal but the name of the man who proposes it I would willingly part with my responsibility for it to any man whom the right hon. Gentleman might prefer. But I think the right hon. Gentleman has told us distinctly that this principle of personal rating and that of what he calls adequate residence—that is, a residence for two years, as expressed in his recent letter—are vital proposals of the Bill from which he is not prepared to depart. Now, if that be so, it is as such that we must treat them. Now, a question was put to-day by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sheffield with so much confidence as regards the House, and so much comfort and satisfaction evidently dwelling in his own mind, and the challenge accompanying that question was so bold that it would be unpardonable in me not to notice it. First, let me say, in passing, that I do not admit to my hon. and learned Friend that there is any circumstance connected with this Motion which ought to lead to the conclusion that it would delay the settlement of the question of Reform. My hon. and learned Friend may have his own opinion on that point; but do not let him treat it as an admission on my part or on that of those who sit near me. “But,” says the hon. and learned Member, “why, because a man is the tenant of a compounding owner, should he be allowed to pay only 15s. instead of the 20s. which would be paid by him if he were a ratepaying householder?” And that I must say was the sole argument which he advanced. Does he want an answer? I will try to give him two. And the first I take from the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Treasury, who entered in the hearing of my hon. and learned Friend upon this portion of the subject, unfortunately, at a time when the House was very thin, and who clearly explained that the difference of 25 per cent which is granted to the landlord under the Small Tenements Act is due to the commission which he receives for the collection and for the risk which he runs of non-recovery, and consequently that the compound-householder pays to the landlord not 15s. but 20s. I believe that the Secretary to the Treasury is very near the truth. But suppose he were not at all near the truth; suppose it were the fact that there was a state of the law in this country under which some portion of the ratepayers of the kingdom were unduly favoured at the cost of the other ratepayers, what, in the world, has that to do with the question of the franchise? Is it a good law, or is it a bad law? If it is right that men should be allowed to compound, let them not on account of paying this compounded rate be debarred from the franchise. If it is wrong that they should be allowed to compound, alter your law, repeal your compounding Acts, and redress and remove that which is a great economic injustice, whether you connect it with the franchise or not. My second answer, therefore, to the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield, is that his objection is totally irrelevant to the question of the franchise, and ought to be dealt with upon grounds entirely apart from any political discussion. Well, the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board and the right hon. Gentleman who last sat down have referred to the question of the lodger franchise; and the latter states that certain gentlemen have informed him that it would be an insult to the working man if the lodger franchise were to be connected either with residence or with value. Now I, Sir, had the advantage of seeing, I believe, those same persons, and I must say that, so far from making any such representations to me, their representations appeared to be in a directly opposite sense; and, as the right hon. Gentleman suspects me, whether with reason or without, of being more in their confidence than himself, I must demur to his statement. Father of the lodger franchise the right hon. Gentleman may be; but there was a great personage of antiquity, the great head of the Roman mythology, who was for nothing so famous as this, that he devoured and made away with his own children. I very much fear that something of this kind may be, or may have been, the case with regard to the right hon. Gentleman and the lodger franchise. But the right hon. Gentleman says that I made light of the lodger franchise. Where does he find those words? In the first place, let me say to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board, that when we brought forward our Bill of last year, we had not all the information as to the circumstances or the feelings of the working classes which we now possess. But the right hon. Gentleman and those who act with him are the true fathers of the agitation which now prevails—they who, as I think, by unwise and unfortunate resistance produced the feeling that now spreads through the country from one end to the other—they at least have been able to secure us this advantage, that we know more of the desires and dispositions of the working classes at this time than we did twelve months ago. But at what time did I state that the lodger franchise—which, it must be recollected, was in our Bill—was one of the provisions of that measure with which we could consent to part? It is true that I never was so sanguine as others were as to the number who would be enfranchised under that provision. At this moment I do not believe that the number to be enfranchised in that mode will be nearly as great as many of the working classes imagine. But a lodger franchise now, as then, is vital to the settlement of this question. And the right hon. Gentleman will not be able to throw on the House and the Members of this House the responsibility of dealing with this essential portion of the subject. He must produce in the Bill his own plan for a lodger franchise, and without that he cannot have the smallest hope that this measure will afford satisfaction to the working classes. I wish the House—especially the Benches behind the Government—had been full at the time when the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury was addressing the House and when he made his pathetic and earnest appeal to the advocates and friends of household suffrage to support this Bill, when he deprecated the conduct of my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, casting on him this reproach—"What! you an advocate of household suffrage, and come forward as an opponent of this Bill? Do you not see that if you support this Amendment you drive household suffrage to a greater distance than ever?" I wish the House generally, and my noble Friend the Member for Haddingtonshire especially, had had the benefit of hearing one of the most animated, one of the most impassioned, and evidently one of the most sincere appeals that has proceeded from any person upon the Treasury Benches during any part of this discussion. The right hon. Gentleman says that the plan I proposed aims at drawing a line downwards below which persons should not be permitted to have the franchise, and also at drawing a line upwards with a view to equal enfranchisement. But a great distinction is to be drawn between the two propositions. I am in favour of drawing a line downwards; and I think my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham and other Gentlemen have given good reasons why, in the present state of this country, it is still desirable to draw such a line. But the drawing of this line is matter of time and circumstance. The extension of the franchise according to the capacity of the people is not an evil, but a good. The enlargement of the pale of the Parliamentary constitution which multiplies the numbers of those whose will, whose thought, whose intelligence, whose education is directly to be interested in the political action of the State—all this is an advantage to the State. All that is requisite is that you should not proceed so fast as to outrun the competence and to disregard the condition of the people. And if the condition of the people were such in point of education and independence as would lead to their free and intelligent exercise of the suffrage with a full independence of character, I should not be the man to say—draw any line at all. The line stands on the circumstances of the time; and the other portions of the plan which I venture to propose stand upon a principle. The principle which I ask the House to recognise is one of permanent application; it is one that never can be wrong. It is this—that those persons whom Parliament recognises as of a class and condition of life fit to be invested with a title to the franchise shall, so far as depends on Parliament, have equal access to the equal enjoyment of those rights. The right hon. Gentleman tells us it is impossible to think of a settlement if you draw a line—admitting the classes more independent and more educated, and excluding the classes less independent and less educated. But he thinks he can bring about a settlement by drawing the line among persons of the same class, by giving one man the franchise and refusing it to another,

though the social position of the two may be exactly the same, and the only difference between them that arising from the fact that one lives at the side of a street in which the Small Tenements Act is in operation, and the other on a side where it is not in operation. ["Oh, oh!"] That is no exaggeration. Are there not ninety-eight boroughs of this country in which such a state of things exists? But we are told that those compound-householders can enfranchise themselves. Sir, it appears to me, on examining the clauses of the right hon. Gentleman, that you may have those compound-householders enfranchised by shoals through the agency of others. That I do not deny. But it will not be by the parish officer. He cannot change the status of the compound-householder. It will be by the interference of political agents. Nothing can be easier in all the small boroughs of the country where there are 300, or 400, or 500 compound-householders than at a cost very moderate—when the scale on which many of our election contests unfortunately are conducted is taken into consideration—to make arrangements for putting a large number of those compound-householders on the register under circumstances which will not render the ratepaying very burdensome to them. I do not deny that this might be done; but that is not the enfranchisement we want; and if this is the remedy proposed, it is worse than the inconvenience it is intended to remove, because it would spread the reign of corruption through those boroughs in a way and to an extent which it would be impossible to detect. I object to this system. I have received no answer to the objection I made that the franchise would be extended by political agency; I have received no answer to my objection that you would establish inequality between one town and another; I have received no answer to my objection that you would establish an inequality between one portion of a town and another portion of the same town; I have received no answer to my assertion that, above all, you would establish an inequality between men in the same social position by setting up a fictitious and artificial distinction. With that view of personal rating, the right hon. Gentleman will hardly be surprised if I say that no Bill founded on the principle of this Bill can settle this question, nor deserve the acceptance of this House. It may be that under pressure the right hon. Gentleman may be able to lead his Colleagues one step after another, removing one restraint after another in order to meet objections from various quarters, and that in this way he may mitigate the evils of the Bill. How far that may go I cannot say; but I must decline all responsibility in respect of a measure which, aiming at a settlement of Parliamentary Reform, introduces into that settlement the poison of a principle so pervading the whole measure that it is hopeless to expect that the Bill will receive the acquiescence of the public mind. We have heard a great deal of the evils which would arise from fixing a limit; but I beg to tell the right hon. Gentleman that, limit or no limit, my objection to personal rating remains the same. If we are to travel to household suffrage—and the right hon. Gentleman has done much, I admit, to make it possible that we will soon arrive there—let us look at the matter in the face, and ask ourselves whether it is desirable we should travel to it through the medium of legislation which, for the short time it can possibly endure, will be nothing more nor less than a political blister on the country. Has the right hon. Gentleman considered the consequences which must result from keeping alive such feelings as this Bill will give rise to? Have hon. Members considered that they may rouse the popular mind with reference to a particular question, while they may have no means of securing that the excitement should be confined to the settlement of that question? Now, I desire to be free from the responsibility involved in that question; and, with the permission of the House, I will read a few words, the production of a man of great ability, Mr. Harrison, written in one of the periodicals not very long ago. He says—

"A vote may be everything or nothing. Its value wholly depends upon the state of the political atmosphere. Universal suffrage in an easy time would produce far less positive results than a narrow franchise in an excited time. It is the heaving of mind and strain of purpose which produce the end, and not the machinery of its expression. The effort necessary to carry out a legal change produces far more results than the change itself."

The excitement of the public mind connected with the passing of an injudicious law is an evil for which I do not wish to be responsible. If we are to travel to household suffrage, it may be that the present Government may be its immediate authors. I am perfectly convinced that the evils, whatever they might be of that state of things, will be neutralized and checked by the good sense of the country ; but I will not consent to travel to it by a road which would be a way of strife and of disturbance, and which would take away from the nation at large the sense of gratitude for the boon received, and would lead us, after a long period of anxiety and agitation, and through a long course of bitter controversy, to a goal which it is vital to the public interest that we should reach by a peaceful and by a liberal course of procedure.

SIR HENRY EDWARDS : Before the Motion is put perhaps I may be allowed to ask a question touching the honour of a Member of this House. I am very sorry to have to do so ; but I feel in honour bound to take this step after what passed in the early part of the evening. It will be in the recollection of the House that in the early part of the evening I put a question to the hon. Member for Nottingham, and an answer was given which was not satisfactory to myself. It reflected upon the honour of an absent Friend of mine who is not here to answer for himself. Therefore, not wishing that the hon. Member for Nottingham should be misrepresented, or that the conduct of my hon. Friend should go forth to the world as improper, I will put this question to the hon. Member, and I trust he will give me a straightforward and candid answer. The hon. Member for Nottingham stated that he had in common courtesy given the hon. and gallant Member for the county of Dublin notice that he was about to bring forward his case before the House. I beg to know how and when the hon. Member did give such notice, for no notice had been received at the office of the hon. and gallant Member for the county of Dublin or at his private residence when the hon. Member for Nottingham brought the matter forward ?

MR. BRAND : Perhaps I may throw some light upon this matter. My hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham asked me to inform my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for the county of Dublin that he was about to bring forward the matter to which the hon. and gallant Member for Beverley referred. I told my hon. Friend I should be happy to inform my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for the county of Dublin. I endeavoured to find him ; but I am very sorry to say I failed in doing so. I was not aware until my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham sat down, that my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for the county of Dublin had met with the accident that I am very sorry to have heard of. I sincerely regret the circumstance that the matter has been brought under the notice of the House in the absence of my hon. and gallant Friend, and I am sure sure that the hon. Member for Nottingham, if he had known of the accident, would not have brought the matter forward.

SIR HENRY EDWARDS : I wish to put another question. Had the hon. Member for Nottingham, before he rose to answer my question, earlier in the evening, ascertained whether the hon. Member for Lewes had communicated with the hon. and gallant Member for the county of Dublin ?

MR. OSBORNE : I am very much obliged to the hon. and gallant Gentleman. I do not know by the by whether he is gallant. I am obliged to him for the mild, gentlemanlike, and courteous way in which he put the question. I shall endeavour not to imitate his manner exactly, but to give a straightforward answer to his question. On entering this House about five minutes past four o'clock, this statement was put into my hand. [Colonel STUART KNOX : Whom by ?] Really, the hon. Gentleman is inquisitive ; but I will satisfy him privately. I had not time to see the hon. and gallant Member for the county of Dublin. I am not in the habit of doing these things. The hon. Gentleman will find, if he chooses to prosecute the matter, that I did not find the hon. and gallant Member ; but I sent to the hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Brand), begging that he would communicate with the hon. and gallant Member for the county of Dublin. I thought they would necessarily meet in the Lobby, and I was not then aware of the accident that happened to him. Had I known it had happened I should never have put the question or brought the matter forward. Had I known it I should have dropped the matter altogether.

SIR HENRY EDWARDS : I stated it.

MR. OSBORNE : I never heard you. I am sorry for what occurred under the circumstances.

MR. DILLWYN rose to speak, but was met with cries of " Order ! "

THE CHAIRMAN : When the hon. and gallant Member for Beverley rose to put a question I thought he was about to put a question which had some connection with the business immediately before us.

This, however, is not a subject which the Committee can now proceed to discuss.

Question put.

QUESTION.

MR. COGAN said, he rose to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If it is the fact as reported in the newspapers that the Solicitor General for Ireland, at a meeting of the Church Education Society held in Dublin on the 10th of April, proposed a resolution which he stated—

"Expressed the positive principles of the Church Education Society as a Scriptural institution, and also its position as an antagonist of the National System ;"

and, whether the Government participate in this condemnation of the National system of Education as compared with that of the Church Education Society, and intend to propose any alterations in it with a view to substitute in its stead a system of education founded on the principles of the Church Education Society ?

LORD NAAS said, in reply, that the precise terms of the resolution moved by the Solicitor General for Ireland on the occasion referred to were—

"That this Society is convinced that the Scriptural instruction of every child having access to their schools is the true principle on which they should stand, and affords good hope, with the Divine blessing, of the advancement of religion, peace, and happiness in the country."

But his hon. and learned Friend pronounced no condemnation whatever of the National system, and merely, in expressing his general concurrence with the views of the Church Education Society, stated his opinion that the principle of the two systems was similar. In answer to the concluding part of the Question of the right hon. Member, he had to state that the Government did not intend to propose any alteration in the National system "with a view to substitute in its stead a system of education founded on the principles of the Church Education Society."

IRELAND—RIVER SHANNON.

QUESTION.

MR. W. ORMSBY GORE said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treassury, Whether Mr. Lynam, Civil Engineer, has made his Report upon the state of the river Shannon; and, if not, when it may be expected?

MR. HUNT said, in reply, that the Report had only been received that morning; but in a few days he hoped it would be laid upon the table of the House.

LUXEMBOURG.—QUESTION.

MR. HORSMAN: I wish, Sir, to put a Question to the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs of which I have given him private notice. I wish to ask, Whether the noble Lord has any objection to inform the House what is the present state of the negotiations respecting Luxembourg; whether it is true that those negotiations have resulted in an arrangement for a Conference in London; and, whether he is prepared to lay upon the table of the House Papers which will show the part the English Government have taken in this transaction?

LORD STANLEY: In reply, Sir, to the Question of the right hon. Gentleman, I have to state that I have reason to believe that the propositions made for a Conference—propositions which were not solely made by England, but by all the Powers neutral in this dispute—will be accepted by both France and Prussia. More than that, although it is too early to speak with absolute confidence on the matter, yet I have every reason to hope, and even to believe, that this question of Luxembourg, which for the last fortnight has disturbed all Europe, is in a fair way to be speedily and amicably arranged. I fear I have no right to state to the House any details as to the present state of the negotiations; because however willing I might be, and I am always willing to explain and to vindicate the course pursued by this Government, it is obvious that I have no right to disclose the proceedings of other Governments, which have been communicated to me more or less confidentially, without the consent of those Governments. I may, however, take this opportunity of contradicting a report which I find has been current that Her Majesty's Government has expressed decided views upon the merits of the question now in dispute between France and Prussia. No such opinion has been expressed. We certainly did express a very strong opinion in favour of settling this question by peaceable means. I may also say that from the first and throughout the language I have held to all parties concerned has been this—that if, unfortunately, matters took a different turn from that which they now seem likely to take, and if hostilities were to break out, the position of England in this quarrel would be one of strict and impartial neutrality.

PRIVATE COMMUNICATIONS—

MR. DILLWYN'S MEMORANDUM.

EXPLANATIONS.

MR. DILLWYN said, he had placed a Motion on the Paper of his intention to put a question to the hon. Member for Nottingham, as to certain Papers which he read to the House on the 12th April, purporting to be the Copy of a Memorandum made by the Member for Swansea; and to ask that Gentleman by what means he obtained such Papers. He would beg to ask leave of the House to make a personal explanation with reference to this subject. He had that morning received a note from the hon. Member (Mr. Osborne), and, as he had found that in dealing with matters in which the hon. Gentleman was concerned it would be better not to trust to memory, he would read the communication he had received from the hon. Gentleman in answer to a private notice he had given him of his intention to bring this matter forward on that occasion. The note was dated "April 28, 1867," from "Newmarket, near Cambridge," and was to this effect—

"Sir,—In case you still wish to address to me the question that stands in the Notice Paper in your name for to-morrow, I beg to inform you that it will not suit my arrangements to be in London before Thursday next. I have the honour to be, your most obedient servant,

"R. OSBORNE."

He should make no comment in the absence of the hon. Gentleman upon the occurrence of the other evening, further than to remark upon the want of courtesy shown by the hon. Gentleman in not giving him notice of his intention to bring the memorandum of which he (Mr. Dillwyn) was the author before the House. Owing to the abrupt manner in which the hon. Gentleman had thought fit to bring the matter forward, he (Mr. Dillwyn) had been taken very much by surprise, and had felt himself in a very awkward position in having to explain at a minute's notice, and in the absence of the hon. and gallant Member for the county of Dublin (Colonel Taylor), transactions in which he and that hon. and gallant Member were concerned. The question he had put upon the Paper was intended to elicit from the hon. Member for Nottingham the means by which he had become possessed of the paper he had read to the House on the 12th of April, which purported to be a copy of the memorandum he (Mr. Dillwyn) had made of the conversation he had had with the hon. and gallant Member for the county of Dublin. The original memorandum made by him was not strictly of either a public or a private character, as it was well known in the lobby that such a memorandum had been drawn up. The right hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Brand), in a letter of the 15th of April, explaining how the paper came into the possession of the hon. Member for Nottingham, said—

“ It struck me that this statement was of the greatest importance as affecting the question before the House, and I accordingly asked Mr. Stanley if he would give me the terms of the memorandum. He thereupon dictated the memorandum, which was afterwards read, and assured me that it was strictly correct.”

This, therefore, gave the required explanation as to the means by which the hon. Member for Nottingham had obtained the paper he read to the House. The statement it contained that the hon. and gallant Member for the county of Dublin had said that the Earl of Derby and the Chancellor of the Exchequer were in favour of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert) upon the Reform Bill was incorrect, inasmuch as the hon. and gallant Member for the county of Dublin did not allude to the opinions of the noble Earl in any way. That document did not refer to the question at issue before the House in any way, but related exclusively to the propriety of adjourning the debate until after the recess, so as to allow time for the consideration of Mr. Hibbert's Amendment by the Cabinet, that consideration being for the time prevented by the illness of Lord Derby. That was the whole purport of the memorandum, and in justice to the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the county of Dublin, he (Mr. Dillwyn) felt bound to explain most explicitly that the hon. and gallant Gentleman did not hint in any manner whatever that Lord Derby was favourable to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert). The memorandum was one merely affecting the adjournment; it was no secret, and he showed it freely to several hon. Members.

Mr. Dillwyn

He thought, however, that in order to prevent such misunderstandings and the necessity for such explanation in future, it would be better if hon. Gentlemen of the experience of the right hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Brand) and the hon. Member for Beaumaris (Mr. Owen Stanley), when they next made a memorandum from recollection, would act a little more cautiously and with a better sense of fair play, and show the memorandum to the hon. Member concerned. They ought, in his opinion, to have shown him the memorandum, and to have ascertained that it was substantially correct. In this case, however, he had nothing further to say than that the memorandum brought forward by the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Osborne) was incorrect, both in form and in substance.

MR. OWEN STANLEY said, he was very sorry to be obliged again to address the House upon this subject; but, after the statement made by the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), he felt that it was incumbent on him to say one or two words. As to giving the hon. Member for Swansea notice, it was not the hon. Member for Swansea who had asked him to read the document; it was another hon. Member—the hon. Member for Lincoln. He was not on terms of private intimacy with the hon. Member for Swansea, and he did not regard the document as in any way a private one. He mentioned it to the right hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Brand) because he had had communications with the right hon. Member with reference to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert). When he found that the document was being shown to hon. Members at eleven o'clock at night—for that was an important fact—he mentioned it to the right hon. Member for Lewes. The hon. Member for Swansea had said that it was drawn up at five o'clock, previous to the Motion for the Adjournment being made by the noble Lord the Member for Chester (Earl Grosvenor). It was, however, eleven o'clock when the document was being shown to hon. Members, certainly with a view to induce those Members favourable to the Amendment to support the Government. It was, of course, difficult, after the perusal of a document, to remember the exact words. The right hon. Member for Lewes, wishing to speak to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone), asked him (Mr. Owen Stanley) for the substance. He accordingly dictated the memorandum read by the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Osborne), which he still believed to be substantially correct. ["Oh!"] That, at all events, was his impression, and was the impression which remained on the minds of other hon. Members who had seen the document. He hoped that he had now convinced the House that he had only acted in this matter in the way that any other hon. Member in his position would have acted. The document was not a private one. It would have influenced the votes of hon. Members on an important question, and might have probably influenced his own. The only inaccuracy might, perhaps, have been the statement professing to be made on the authority of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for the county of Dublin (Colonel Taylor) that Lord Derby was personally in favour of the Amendment. He (Mr. Owen Stanley), however, certainly thought that the document was so worded, and after hearing the speech of the hon. Member for Swansea the House could easily believe that it was a little involved. At any rate the matter could be easily cleared up. If the hon. Member would only produce the document, it would speak for itself.

IRELAND—THE TYRONE MAGISTRACY. QUESTION.

COLONEL STUART KNOX said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he has any objection to place on the table copies of the following documents connected with the charges made by Mr. Justice Keogh at the late Assizes for Tyrone against certain Magistrates of that county—namely, statement of the Judge from the Bench; his Report to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland; the correspondence that has ensued between the Lord Chancellor and the Magistrates in question; also Copy of the Evidence of the Constables at the Petty Sessions at Dungannon on the 1st of October, 1866, upon whose statements the Judge founded his remarks?

LORD NAAS, in reply, said, he believed it would be necessary to institute an inquiry into the whole of the circumstances connected with the case to which the hon. and gallant Gentleman referred. Under those circumstances, it would clearly be improper to produce any documents until that inquiry was completed. When, however, that time had arrived all the documents should be laid upon the table of the House.

QUESTION.

MR. POWELL said, he rose to ask, Whether it is likely that progress will be made with the Factory Bill that night?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, in reply, that it must depend on the progress which might be made with other Bills.

MR. BRIGHT said, he wished to ask, if the right hon. Gentleman would consult with the Home Secretary as to the propriety of referring the Factory Bill to a Select Committee. He believed that all persons concerned in the operation of the Bill thought it might be made more satisfactory if it were referred to a Select Committee. He had understood that the Home Secretary was not much indisposed to such a course, and he (Mr. Bright) had received requisitions from Birmingham to that effect.

TENANTS IMPROVEMENTS (IRELAND) BILL—[BILL 29.]

(Lord Naas, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [4th April], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. GREGORY said, in moving the Amendment of which he had given notice, he had no intention of preventing the Bill from going into Committee. There were two principles in the Bill of which he cordially approved—the first, that which enabled tenants to borrow money from the Government for the improvement of their farms; the second, that which permitted tenants to remove fixtures erected by themselves in case of their failing to come to an understanding with their landlord, or the incoming tenant, to remunerate them for the outlay. These were two important principles, and to assert them it was well worth while to read the Bill a second time. He (Mr. Gregory) must, however, assert his conviction that if the object of the noble Lord was to come to a settlement of what was called the land question in Ireland, this Bill would have no effect whatever. The noble

Lord might say that his Bill is not intended as a settlement; but as Her Majesty's gracious Speech at the opening of Parliament had dwelt at such length on this subject, and as the Bill of the late Chief Secretary was accepted as a settlement, although he (Mr. Gregory) could not look on it as such, he could hardly imagine why the subject should be introduced at all, and why provisions which certainly did infringe on the rights of property should be sanctioned by a Conservative Government, except on the overwhelming plea of withdrawing this question finally and completely—so far as politics admitted of finality and completeness—from the list of Irish discontents. The Bill appeared to him to have three cardinal defects. It was inapplicable to a great portion of the Irish tenancies; it utterly ignored and passed by the real cause of discontent among the peasantry of Ireland, and it needlessly violated the rights of property. As regards the first objection, there were 307,098 tenancies in Ireland under fifteen acres, representing in round numbers over a 1,500,000 souls. How was it possible to apply the principle of this Bill to these small holdings? It was clear, however, that the attempt to do so was contemplated. The noble Lord, in his introductory speech, informed the House that inspectors were to be stationed in various localities to encourage the peasantry to take loans from the Government to improve their holdings, and these inspectors were to be urged to greater zeal, because they were to derive their salaries from fees on the money expended. [Lord NAAS: I did not say so.] The noble Lord denied that such was his statement. He (Mr. Gregory) had certainly so understood him; but, whether it were so or not, what possible reliance could there be that the money would be well spent? Could they not picture to themselves the scamper there would be to get a pull at the public funds; and could they not also fancy the clamour when re-payment was demanded? No doubt in many cases the inspector would only recommend improvements which would really increase the value of the farm. But there would be others not so competent nor so scrupulous. He (Mr. Gregory) doubted from his knowledge of Ireland whether it would be possible to get the number of competent men. If the Bill was meant to be inoperative, it would be easy enough; but if the Bill were really to do what it proposes to do, there would be required a swarm of men of skill, experience and integrity, and where were they to be found? And if such men were not to be found, was it to be sanctioned that the owners of land in Ireland were to have charges scattered broadcast over their properties at the arbitrary decree of some ignorant or venal man, and the only way in which the infliction could be avoided would be by a notice to quit, which would be denounced as an act of inconceivable tyranny. Let them also conceive, apart from this extremely mischievous invasion on property, the discontents that might be produced by a dishonest, or reckless, or even incompetent inspector. He sanctions; indeed, he encourages loans right and left. The peasants are delighted to touch the cash—the improvements are badly done or turn out to be no improvement at all—land might be drained which from its intrinsic badness could never repay the outlay. But the evil day approaches—instalments become due—dissatisfaction ensues. The peasant declares he borrowed at the instigation of his inspector, that he was misled by him, and thus there might be a whole district resisting the payment of what would be considered an unjust debt, contracted by the advice of Government officials, and the Members of the county would be called on at their peril to batter and assail the Treasury for remission, an office which they would perform, doubtless, with vigour and pertinacity. This was a matter which a Government lending public money would do well to consider. In his (Mr. Gregory's) opinion money might safely be lent on land held on lease, and any Scotch or English tenant farmer would inform the House, as the hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Read), the very best authority, being himself a tenant-farmer, had already informed the House, that the principal and interest might be re-paid within twenty-one years with ample remuneration to the borrower. Should, however, a longer period for repayment be considered desirable, there was the proposal of Mr. Caird, a gentleman well known for his able letters in The Times on the agricultural condition of Ireland, and lately a distinguished Member of Parliament. He recommends that the State should lend on a thirty-four years' lease, and he is not of opinion that public money should be lent on a tenancy-at-will. This reference to leases led him to the second objection, that the Bill ignored and passed by the real cause of discontent among the peasant classes of Ireland, and that was the instability of tenure. No Bill which did not aim at affecting an alteration in the state of things in which ninety-five out of every 100 tenants existed on the soil by the mere will of the landlord could ever be called a settlement of the question. That alteration should be effected cautiously, gradually, and with due respect to the rights of property. It would be worse than useless, it would be an additional irritation, were any Government to place upon the statute book any enactment which should not have this eventual change of tenure as its prominent and predominant feature. The noble Lord (Lord Naas) knew Ireland well enough. He must be well aware that there could be no attachment to the institutions of a country on the part of a peasantry who are living on sufferance on its soil. It would not be inconsistent with Conservative principles to try and remedy this evil. There was nothing conservative in a tenancy-at-will. In his opinion it was the most revolutionary tenure in the world. In making these observations he had not the least idea of advocating any measure to force landlords to give leases right and left without due precautions and selection. The discretion of landlords should be considered; but that discretion might be urged and encouraged. He entirely agreed with Lord Dufferin, who thus wrote—

“No one had been a stronger advocate for leases than myself. To refuse a lease to a solvent, industrious tenant is nothing less, in my opinion, than a crime. The prosperity of agriculture depends on security of tenure, and the only proper tenure is a liberal lease. Yet, I cannot conceive a measure more fraught with disaster to agriculture, more productive of discontent, more certain to inflict suffering on a large proportion of the tenant farmers of the country than that the Irish landlords should be driven by any legislation into an indiscriminate issue of leases for a term of years.”

This opinion of Lord Dufferin agreed with the Report of the Devon Commissioners, who say—

“Upon some well regulated estates the property of intelligent and liberal landlords who are upon the best footing with their tenants, no leases are given; but we cannot forbear to express our opinion that, as a general system, it is more for the interest of both landlord and tenant that leases of moderate length should be given.”

It was true that even here the Commissioners deprecated the “direct interference of the Legislature;” but though they might have deprecated compulsion, it is quite clear they would not have deprecated encouragement. Now, in framing any Bill for the improvement of the relation of landlord and tenant there were two indispensable postulates—the one, that the provisions of the Bill should be clear and simple; the second, that they should be self-acting. The moment they enacted intricate provisions legislation became useless. The moment landlords and tenants were brought into any kind of collision it was simply mischievous. The old saying, vigilantibus non dormientibus leges subvenire should be reversed in this case. Bearing in mind the dangerous ground on which they legislated, the infinite mischief they might create by any enactment promoting litigation between landlord and tenant, the new arrangements, whatever they might be, should work silently and of themselves. Their objects should be rather dormientibus quam vigilantibus subvenire. Apply these tests to every successive Landlord and Tenant Bill brought in by different Governments, and they will all be open to objection, the Bill of the late Chief Secretary as well as that of the noble Lord. But it is said why legislate at all, no measure which Parliament could sanction would ever satisfy the real feeling which lay underneath this land question. That feeling was derived from old traditional custom, that the land belonged to the tribe, that is to the people, that the utmost the owner could claim was a reserved rent held on a valuation, and that no eviction should ever be allowed or interference permitted in the tenant's management of the land so long as that annuity was paid. He (Mr. Gregory) remembered well making that observation to Mr. Dillon last year, and here he would express his regret at the untimely death of a man whose honesty and moderation and thorough knowledge of the question would have been of inestimable service as a mediator in this matter. Mr. Dillon replied that unquestionably that feeling prevailed, but that it took its strength and vigour from the irritation which had grown up under the present state of things, and that he was confident that if he and others whom the tenants looked on as their advocates and friends came forward and declared that a measure had been passed which, while doing no wrong to landlords, would place the tenants' position on a more secure foundation, this source of agitation and bitterness would speedily dry up. It was now necessary to advance another step, and in order to ascertain what should be the tendency of legislation, it was worth while to trace the growth of what was called the Irish Land question. Lord Naas was quite right in saying that it was only of recent years that it had assumed its present prominence. It was true that O'Connell did, as the hon. Member for Tralee (The O'Donoghue) mentioned, refer at times to the lamentable condition of the Irish peasantry; still the land question, as such, was small until recent years, when successive Governments discovered the danger of the sore, and had tried to plaister it. It seemed strange enough that in former days, when agrarian outrages and murders were rife in Ireland, this subject should have formed so small a part of the political professions of the day; but that now, when murder and outrage were almost unknown, when wealth and education had so much increased, it should have assumed its present prominence. The cause of this was worth examining. The first forty or fifty years of this century were different from the present. The tenure of land was different—leases were far more the rule than at present. [Colonel FRENCH: They were universal.] There was less supervision over estates, and the proceedings of leaseholders were unchecked. He (Mr. Gregory) remembered that when his father succeeded to his estate in 1840 there was not a holding which did not depend on lease. Twenty years afterwards there was not a single lease on the property, but almost everywhere there was a crop of small and almost pauper under tenants. In those days the elective franchise depended on a 40s. freehold, and subsequently on a lease. The landlord's political status and influence depended on the numbers he could bring to the poll. In short, the people did as they liked, they increased and multiplied, subdivided and again subdivided. The pressure for existence was strong enough, but the crisis had not yet come. Outrages there were without end, but they were directed against infractions of a lawless code, established and recognised by the peasantry. Their sufferings had not entered into the domain of politics. They had no mouthpieces. They made themselves intelligible by the bludgeon and the blunderbus. That the social system was diseased, was clear enough to all; but it was thought a periodical and generous system of hanging would put all things to rights, and so they hung them. A change, however, came; the Corn Laws were abolished and there was a period of low prices. The mode of voting was changed, and votes depended not on leases but on rating. The old long lease with lives was found most injurious to the country, though pleasant enough to tenants, as by their means indefinite and unchecked sub-divisions were carried on, and so landlords refused to renew. During the great political agitation of O'Connell, in many cases tenants went against landlords, and when leases fell in they were not renewed. Last of all came the famine, and nearly every lease in Ireland was swept away. To that succeeded the Incumbered Estates Court. By its operations a vast amount of land changed hands, and very many of the old landlords passed away with it. All these changes, though an improvement to the country, brought little comfort to the peasant. The old landlord, if wasteful and careless and needy, was generally kind to, and easy with, the tenants. Their families and his family had lived in close contact for many a long day, and with a people so disposed to attach themselves, a deep sympathy with what was called the old stock existed, and that feeling was reciprocated by the landlords. Too much easiness, far more than too much harshness, was the fault and characteristic of the past age of Irish landlords. Then came a new race, men who had accumulated funds and laid them out in land as an investment, who knew not the peasantry and cared but little for them. The land must pay more, that they might have a better interest for their money. The land was badly tilled, and there was not sufficient stock, so they took it into their own hands. The peasant thus found himself with his rent raised and in danger of eviction, and in the hands of new and unsympathetic landlords. Of course, he (Mr. Gregory) was speaking generally. In many instances now the landlords had regenerated their property, and were esteemed and trusted by the tenants. He knew many such in his part of Ireland, but they were exceptions. It will be seen that every change had made the peasant's condition more precarious than before. Throughout the length and breadth of the land—that is to say, in the East, West, and South of Ireland, for he was not speaking of the North, where a better tenancy prevailed—there was no stability of tenure. Every ninety-five out of every 100 tenants knew that a breath had made them and a breath could unmake. Then arose the cry for landlord and tenant legislation. If he (Mr. Gregory) had rightly traced the history of what is called the land question, it would not be difficult to find the real remedy. At first compensation for improvements was the cry, but that was because the words sounded speciously in English ears, but compensation for improvements was the merest moonshine. All the compensation which the wit of lawyers could devise would not give contentment. In treating a question like this in connection with any people under the sun, sentiment and feeling should be a strong ingredient, but of all people this ought to be well considered in dealing with a susceptible, imaginative people like the Irish. If that sentiment and feeling were utterly unreasonable and absurd let them cast it behind them, but if they themselves being in the same position would, in all probability, be under the same influences, they were bound to consider them in legislation. He (Mr. Gregory) then tried to put himself in the position of the Irish peasants, and he was satisfied that the predominant cause of dissatisfaction was the uncertain and precarious character of the tenure on which their very existence depended. He had seen much of the people lately. He had endeavoured to arrive at their inmost thoughts, and this was the result of his investigation. Was it unnatural? Unfortunately the opponents of the conclusions at which he arrived were the very best men in Ireland. The really good, conscientious, improving landlords were the persons who least could appreciate the feeling he had described. They lived among an attached and contented tenantry. They knew that those men neither wanted nor would accept increased security. As far as security went these tenants believed that a tenancy-at-will offered more permanency than a lease, for the expiration of the lease implied a break of tenure. In some properties a tenancy-at-will was almost a fixity of tenure. He would give a strange illustration of that. A few years back a noble Friend of his, one of the best and most beloved landlords in Ireland, ejected a tenant for the most outrageous conduct. The tenant took defence, and pleaded that so long as a tenant paid his rent there had not been an instance of ejectment on the estate, and that such was the custom of the country. The plea, of course, was disallowed. Here, then, is the chief difficulty of those who plead for leases. They had for opponents men of the highest authority, authority derived from the exemplary performance of duties, and who cannot be brought to see that all were not like themselves. Against such it is hard to contend. Every witness before the Land Committee of 1864 deposed that if all landlords were good and did their duty no legislation would be required. They had great authority for saying that the law was not made for the righteous. Precisely the same state of things prevailed in the Southern States in connection with slavery. It was invariably the best masters who were most scandalized and provoked at attacks on a system which they believed was accepted with joy and gratitude by the slaves, was administered kindly and benevolently, and which conferred a greater amount of comfort than the black population could otherwise have reached. But as in the slave plantations, so in Ireland—something happened. The good landlord may die. The son may be an absentee, neglectful, a spendthrift. The estate may fall into the hands of a grasping, self-seeking agent. Acts of injustice are committed, and terror and suspicion extend far and wide. The landlord, too, may be harsh, griping, greedy—such there are in Ireland as in other countries; then it is that the defenceless condition of the Irish tenant becomes clear to all. The unfortunate wretches under his control know that they are in a bad man's hands, and that hand may crush them. The result was disaffection, and a surface of sentiment ready to receive the seeds of any project to overthrow the institutions and the laws which maintained and shielded these evil doings. Let him give the House one instance. The largest landlord in extent of acres in Ireland was in his county, and in the adjacent county of Mayo. Besides other acts of omission and commission, unnecessary to refer to here, the manner in which this great territory was managed was in this way. Formerly, together with the receipt for the rent, a notice to quit was issued. Now once every year the tenant had to sign an agreement that he took his holding for one year only, so that on that day twelvemonth, without any reason or cause assigned, he might find himself and his family cast adrift on a bleak mountain side in Connemara. This was the practice of the greatest territorial landlord in Ireland. Thank God, that landlord was not Irish. It was a great English company—the Law Life Society, managed by gentlemen some of whom had seats in that House, some of whom called themselves Liberal. Now he (Mr. Gregory) did not propose to interfere directly even in such an outrageous case as this, but he did think legislation should be resorted to to discourage such a state of things. That, then, was his reply to the argument that leases were not cared for—they were not cared for undoubtedly where the tenant had thorough confidence in his landlord, and the successor of his landlord. They were desired and craved for when there was no confidence in the landlord, or even where there was confidence, but when the destination of the property was uncertain. Then, again, he was asked would he encourage leases to very small holders. His answer was certainly not. The tenants' witnesses in 1864 deposed unanimously that in these cases it would be unnecessary and even unwise to give leases. Judge Longfield, Mr. M'Carthy Dowling, the Catholic Bishop of Cloyne, and even Mr. Dillon himself, were of that opinion. Then he was told to look at the evil effect of leases in former days—"See," say the objectors, "how these leases have turned out—the middleman has been their creation, and the lands held by them have been pauper warrens, the source of half the misery of the country." The objection was a valid one, but why? because these leases were long and almost gambling leases—leases of thirty-one years and three lives, leases in which there were no covenants, or if any they were covenants without penalties and evaded. He (Mr. Gregory) believed such leases to be worse than none at all, and such was the almost unvarying depositions of the witnesses before the Devon Commission, that these leases had been the curse and bane of Ireland. Again, it was said—leased land was not one whit better cultivated, or more capital and labour expended on it than in the cases of a tenancy-at-will. That was a disputed point, but even if admitted let them do this—let them place a tenant-at-will and a tenant on lease side by side on any property save that of a first-rate landlord, and then he would leave it to them to estimate who would be the loyal man in an emergency—who would be the defender of law, order, and the institutions under which he lived. That was a consideration for a legislator. One would hardly imagine that arguments were needed to prove that a country where the landlord, generally speaking, did little for the tenant—he qualified his language by the words generally speaking—and where the whole tenure was at will, could never be really contented. It was totally impossible it should be so. A community that could dwell together in unity under such circumstances must be a community of angels. The mere fear of eviction was not the sole disturbing cause, but that constant exercise of power and interference which must be galling to any man of independent spirit. The Irish peasant is reproached for want of that independent spirit. He is described as servile, lazy, unimproving, dependent. May not the training he has had for centuries account for this. He (Mr. Gregory) would be slow to admit inferiority of race to have much to do with the backwardness of those whose relations and comrades have been pre-eminent in France and Spain, and even in England, for their military and civil genius. Hitherto, and up to this point, he had been debating this question on mere abstract arguments. Let him now turn to something more definite. Take the example of two countries where there was the greatest content among the agricultural classes—namely, Scotland and Prussia. He did not refer to France, because there the peasants were proprietors. Now he (Mr. Gregory) said, on the introduction of this Bill, that Scotland showed us how the largest possible amount of produce could be derived from the soil, how the largest rents could be obtained, and how perfect harmony and good feeling could prevail between landlord and tenant. But had they tenancies-at-will then? Such a thing was unknown, and would not be listened to. Leases of fixed but of moderate duration prevail. In Prussia, again, 25 per cent of the peasantry were tenants, the rest were proprietors in fee. There, also, great content prevailed, but a tenancy-at-will was unknown—in every case of letting land there was a contract or lease made for a given number of years. In Eastern Prussia this contract usually ran from twelve to twenty years; in Westphalia, from seven to twelve; in the Rhine Provinces, from three to seven and nine years. His informant was a gentleman who went to Prussia two years ago for the express purpose of looking into the state of land tenure and education there. Commenting on the tenant's position in Prussia, Mr. Ussher says—

"What is known as 'tenant right' among the Irish farmers in the North of Ireland has never been heard of in Prussia. The tenancies being all by contract or lease at the expiration of the term agreed upon—be it for whatever period, long or short—the farm is re-let to the highest and most solvent bidder, and it would seem to a German peasant a most inexplicable thing how anyone could have a right to or claim on anything which he hired from the owner for a yearly payment once the contract ended."

Now he (Mr. Gregory) quoted that sentence, as it was pregnant with wholesome deductions. Irish landlords complained of the strange doctrines that were springing up, of fixity of tenure, compulsory valuation, and other communistic invasions of the right of property, against which he inveighed as strongly as any one; but in Scotland, and above all in Prussia, the country of Stein and Hendenburgh, where infractions on proprietary rights might be expected to be advocated, no such doctrines were maintained. It was grievance which gave birth to the demand for wild and impracticable remedies, and grievances if not redressed would make these remedies appear less wild and less impracticable every day they were deferred. Now, it is said in England there are plenty of tenancies-at-will, and all goes well with them; but the difference is great; the English tenant is comparatively wealthy, his landlord has done everything for him, built, fenced, drained. If he goes out what does he leave behind him—not even a regret. But to the Irish tenant eviction is tantamount to ruin, expatriation, and the breaking up of every family tie; and the fear of this, the chance of this, made men rebels in thought if not in acts. Mr. James O'Connell last year made a speech at Killarney against the Fenians, and he said, "It is the greatest folly to talk of rebellion with butter at £4 the firkin." There was true wisdom in that observation—disaffection and misery and insecurity went hand in hand; and he would venture to say that if the system of leases were as prevalent in Ireland as the tenure-at-will, they would find almost every farmer in the country a special constable, unsworn indeed, but determined to protect those institutions under which he dwelt in safety, none making him afraid, and he (Mr. Gregory) would not modify that assertion, even by the fact of a farmer with a lease of forty acres having been shot when out with the Fenians some weeks ago. Now, let him (Mr. Gregory) take this opportunity of saying a few words as regards that class to which he belonged—namely, the landlords of Ireland. One would really imagine from the speeches made and the articles written that the Irish landlords as a class were to be stigmatized as reckless, overbearing, oppressive, or else as neglectful and unmindful of their tenants. He had no doubt many persons imagined that Irish upper society was, as in the days described by Sir Jonah Barrington, and the author of Harry Lorrequer, drinking and gambling all night, fighting duels in the morning, and the survivors riding steeplechases all day. But a visitor to Ireland would tell a different story. If he went about among the lower classes he would generally find great attachment on the part of the peasantry to the resident landlords. Instead of a reckless and improvident set he would describe the landlords as rather saving than wasting, and as taking the greatest pains in the improvement of their properties. If he had known the country for the last twenty-five years he would remark the most notable improvement in the cultivation of the land, and of the stock on the land, and in the dress and general deportment and behaviour of the people. He would tell you also that there is a landlord side as well as a tenant side of the question. That much had been said of the improvements by tenants, but very little of the reckless and ruinous destruction of the land by tenants, and that if a balance were struck far more land was returned to the landlord deteriorated and worn out than had come back to him with improvements. He (Mr. Gregory) was bound to say that, if they exterminated the landlords, which had been so charitably and judiciously proposed, they would not oblige the tenants. There must be a landlord somewhere, and there was no fact more notorious, as he had said before, than that the new landlords under the Incumbered Estates Court had pressed more heavily on the tenants than the old. They, the landlords, had their faults—all classes had their faults—but extermination was a bad cure. He had never heard the extermination of the millowners proposed by the holders of land, because some of them practised and enforced the villanies of the truck system, or because some of them tried to reject the Ten Hours' Bill under the specious title of freedom of labour, which freedom of labour they knew in their hearts meant freedom to grow up like beasts—freedom to pine away an unhealthy youth—freedom to seek into an untimely grave. He (Mr. Gregory) objected to being exterminated himself. He objected to the extermination of any class, because of the shortcomings of individuals, and because of faults engendered and fostered, and maintained by bad laws, and ages of misgovernment. A far better thing than the extermination of a class was the extermination of bad agencies, which were breeding discontent. Now, if they thought that a state of things was likely to breed discontent, which left ninety-five out of every 100 tenants at the caprice of the landlord, if such a state of things did not prevail in any civilized country in the world, then, he said, let your Landlord and Tenant Bill rest on a different basis from the one before them, let its object be to tap the fountain of bitterness at its source, and give a Bill which should cautiously and gradually, and in the most conservative spirit change the present relations, and encourage some stability in the occupation of land in Ireland. He (Mr. Gregory) was the last man to advocate wild and communistic principles. He believed one great hindrance to the settlement of this problem were the wild and preposterous views emanating from some of those who called themselves the tenants' friends in Ireland. He did not even imagine that if his Amendment were accepted by acclamation and a law passed to give it effect, that a cure would be obtained for the ingrained and inevitable diseases of centuries, and that Irish disaffection would subside into a great calm. There was something more than land in these diseases of Ireland. They pervaded the whole social system as well as the peasant. They were like fevers, they came, they disappeared, but they returned again; 1798 and 1822, 1848 and 1867 were the epochs; United Irishmen, Ribbonmen, Terry Alts, Smith O'Brien and James Stephens were the symptoms. Leases alone would be no antidote to Fenianism, for Fenianism was complex. Irrespective of the base motives of vanity, love of notoriety, hopes of plunder, it was a mixture of the recollection of past wrongs, of the sense of present grievances and neglect, and of the hope of a future nationality; but as past wrongs and future schemes were sentimental, and as present grievances were real, let them deal with what they acknowledged to be wrong. He asked them, therefore, by that vote, which he meant to press, did they or did they not consider tenancy-at-will to be the best tenure for a country's welfare and content. All who did so would vote against him. On the other hand, if they thought a gradual change was advisable, they would vote for his Amendment. The remedy was in the hands of the House. There were various ways of encouraging leases. Some would advocate the more stringent course, and say the law now gives certain privileges to the landlord. These privileges may be curtailed or withheld where property was not managed in accordance with what the State considered to be of benefit to the common weal. Others would say that to give the landlord the fullest safeguard against sub-division, to diminish the term of redemption, to facilitate the recovery of possession, that these advantages would alone be sufficient to multiply leases throughout the country. Surely to this proposal, at all events, the objection cannot be raised that it interferes with the rights of property, that it promotes strife between landlord and tenant. All parties might therefore concur in his Amendment, and the House would be alone pledged to an expression of opinion that a system based on moderate security of tenure was superior to an uncertain tenure at will. As a landlord, and deriving everything he had in the world from land in Ireland, he firmly believed that the course he advocated was quite as much for his interest as that of his tenants, both as regards influence and income, and he was convinced that were a Bill based on some sound principle to become law, not one year would elapse before they would have their reward in the increased confidence of the peasant classes in the justice of Parliament, and in the increased peace and stability of the realm. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Amendment.

MR. BRYAN, in seconding the Amendment, said, that considering, too, the prominent position which the Irish land question occupied in the Speech from the Throne, he could not but express his surprise at the meagreness of the measure proposed by the noble Lord for the settlement of this much-agitated and most important question. What Ireland asked for was something in the nature of security of tenure, and unless that were incorporated in the Bill no measure that could be proposed on the subject would give satisfaction. He (Mr. Bryan) honestly confessed he was an advocate for the granting of leases to the occupants of all holdings, whether they be large or small. It was admitted on all sides that there was necessity for legislation on this subject; but he believed that the general desire was that this subject, like the Reform question, should be legislated upon once and for ever. But he warned the House against supposing that this Bill, if passed, would settle the question. Far from it—it would be speedily consigned to the same tomb in which the measure of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford (Mr. Cardwell) now reposed in oblivion the most complete. If the tenant farmers in Ireland had leases the military would be no more required in elections in that country than they were in England. The fact was that the military were as much required there to induce tenants to vote as their landlord or his agents directed as to preserve peace. It would be impossible to pass a compulsory clause, but it might be made to be the interest of the landlords to give long leases by placing obstructions in the way of those who refused to grant them. It might, for instance, be made the interest of landlords to grant leases by enacting that the tenant from year to year, instead of receiving a six months' notice to quit, should receive a twelve months' notice or a longer period. Could not the county cess and poor rates be made recoverable in the first instance from those landlords who insist on going back to feudal times, and making their tenants little better than villeins regardant? It might not have the desired effect; but he saw no reason why they should deal with the county cess and poor rates as they now did with regard to the tithe rent-charge. If the Government would accept this Resolution and act upon this view of the question, it would have the desirable effect of making lease-giving the law or custom of the country; and that once established would be as strong as the law of the land. He felt certain the Law Advisers of the Government would very soon be able to devise a plan that would place non-lease-giving landlords in an unenviable or perhaps an untenable position. The second Bill introduced by Her Majesty's Government was, however, the most important of the two. It proposed to empower tenants to borrow money for the purpose of improving their holdings; but in his opinion the Bill, if passed, would do that which was exactly contrary to the noble Lord's intention, and stop leasing altogether. They all knew how jealous landlords were of having their lands improved without their consent; but how much more would he be so to have his estate made the spoil of his tenants, the commissioners, and inspectors? The noble Lord had said there was at present about £1,000,000 belonging to the tenant farmers lying in the banks of Ireland; but he (Mr. Bryan) could inform the noble Lord that it was considerably over £3,000,000, which if the tenant farmer could see his way to any stability of holding would immediately flow into the land. The principle of compensation should be that which was contained in the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Louth (Mr. Chichester Fortescue) when he was Chief Secretary—namely, that the tenant who increased the letting value of the land should be entitled to compensation; and that, he believed, was the principle which Irish Members were indisposed to part with. Without desiring to give offence, he considered this a feeble measure—rather a feeble bid for popularity. It at first sight appeared to be a Bill that would do no harm, but which would be found to be mischievous in practice. He earnestly appealed to Her Majesty's Government, and especially to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who, he had been told, took a deep and lively interest in all that concerned Ireland, to give Ireland a good Bill, and thereby see how promptly they would change the state of the country. They had tried coercive measures long enough, with but indifferent results, and he now called upon them to try conciliation, and by a good, useful, honest measure, earn the lasting gratitude of that country.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "without prejudging the Second Reading of this Bill, this House is of opinion that no enactment for the settlement of the Landlord and Tenant question in Ireland can be deemed satisfactory which does not provide for the encouragement of leases in that Country,"—(Mr. Gregory,)

—instead thereof.

MR. SANDFORD said, he had risen thus early in the debate because he considered it was desirable that this subject should be taken up as a whole, and not be broken up into fragmentary discussions. He wished, in the first place, to express his deep conviction that the efforts made by successive Governments to interfere with the natural contracts that should subsist between landlord and tenant had by no means conduced to the prosperity of Ireland. They were told that the land tenure in Ireland was an exceptional one, that it had been caused by exceptional legislation; and that it could only be remedied by further exceptional legislation. Now he (Mr. Sandford) believed that if they were to attempt to do so they would be merely moving in a vicious circle. He considered that the best panacea for Ireland was to leave her alone, and close the Notice Book against all similar Bills and Motions and Amendments on the subject for ten years. During that time the landlords and tenants of Ireland might teach themselves something of self-reliance, and at the end of the period they would find that the condition of the land tenure of Ireland would have considerably improved; and if, on the contrary, they crowded the book with Notices of Motion with regard to the land tenure in England, and endeavoured to teach landlord and tenant, instead of relying on their own foresight and arrangement, to look for Government assistance and rely on Government supervision, the condition of land tenure in England would have become almost as bad as it now was in Ireland. All the Governments that had existed during the last fifteen years were much to blame for having meddled and tinkered with this question; but of all the Governments who had endeavoured to legislate upon this subject we had the right to look with the greatest feeling of suspicion and distrust to the noble Lord and the Members of the present Government. He recollected how in 1852, when he first had the honour of a seat in that House, and when his ingenuous mind was not so accustomed to the Conservative measures of Conservative Governments, how a measure was then brought in giving retrospective compensation to Irish tenants, which, disguise it by what term they pleased, meant confiscation. That Bill was brought in, he would say, by the present Government, because Lord Derby was Premier, with the same Chancellor of the Exchequer, and with the same noble Lord as Secretary for Ireland. The present Bill proposed to advance £1,000,000 to the tenants of Ireland for improvements in three cases in which the landlord's assent was required, and three in which it was not—the latter being, thorough drainage, the reclamation of bog land, and the removal of useless fences. Now, from the experience they had of the reclamation of bog land, they knew how easy it was for persons to be mistaken upon that subject, and how doubtful it was whether any real improvement could be effected. And the 7th section of the

Bill provided that such land should be charged with the re-payment of the loan even where the improvement was not successful, if in the opinion of the Commission it was likely that the improvement would be ultimately successful so that the property of the landlord might be charged for thirty-five years for attempted improvements undertaken without their consent, and which had turned out wholly unremunerative. He asked the noble Lord (Lord Naas) why he proposed to take in this way from the landlord the control of his own property. He knew of no grounds upon which such an interference with the rights of property could be defended except by broadly saying that property should be enjoyed and administered not in the interest of the few who possessed it, but for the many who had it not, and that the State being the best judge of the matter had the right to step in and administer it for the benefit of the nation at large. Those doctrines were not new. They had heard them before. They were the principles of Blanqui in the language of Proudhon; but he did not expect to find them brought forward by a Conservative Government and embodied in a measure dealing with the land of Ireland. They had been accustomed to hear it said that property had its duties as well as its rights; but he begged to observe that if the State took away from landlords the enjoyment of their rights, it must equally exempt them from the discharge of its duties. No doubt he should be told that if they read this Bill a second time, they might remedy all this in Committee. He had reason to believe the noble Lord would propose to refer it to a Select Committee. They could not, however, read the Bill a second time, because they would assent to its principle by so doing; and, in the second place, they had a precedent to the contrary, which he thought would have some weight with Her Majesty's Government and with his noble Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and that was the precedent of last year. On that occasion the noble Lord (Lord Naas) moved the following Amendment to the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Louth (Mr. Chichester Fortescue):—

“This House, though desirous of simplifying the method of securing to tenants compensation for outlay made in permanent improvements, are of opinion that, in any measure relating to the tenure and improvement of land in Ireland, it is expedient to maintain the principle affirmed by the Act of 1860—namely, that compensation to tenants should be secured in respect of those improvements only which are made with the consent of the landlord."

This Amendment was moved on the 17th of April, 1866, by his noble Friend (Lord Naas), who thus had taken not quite a year to change his mind upon the subject. Again, the Committee which sat in 1865 upon this subject reported—

"That the Committee, having examined several witnesses on the recommendation of the promoters of the inquiry, are of opinion that the principle of the Act of 1860 embodied in the 38th and 40th sections—namely, that compensation to tenants should only be secured upon the improvements made with the consent of the landlord—should be maintained."

This paragraph was likewise prepared by the noble Lord. And such being his recorded opinions in 1865 and 1866, he thought they had a right to ask the noble Lord why he had changed his opinions upon this subject in 1867? They had certainly seen and heard of many marvellous changes in the history of Parliamentary careers; but he remembered no conversion so sudden and so complete as that of his noble Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland. He believed the fact was that thirty or forty Irish Members had banded together for the purpose of getting fixity of tenure in Ireland, and, perhaps, his noble Friend, now that he was in office, might think that if he could only modify the opposition of these Irish Members, it would not, perhaps, bring him fixity of tenure, but would lengthen his lease of office. There was no other mode of accounting for the Government Bill, except on the theory that Conservatives were ready to defend the rights of property when in opposition, but would subvert these rights when in power. If that were so, people who had anything to lose, especially Irish landlords, might come to the conclusion that the rights of property would be more respected when Conservative statesmen were in opposition than when they were in office. This measure, so far from settling the question, would unsettle it, and the £1,000,000 distributed amongst the impoverished tenantry would only, in the words of the hon. Member for Birmingham, "wet the lips but leave the palate dry." If they assented to it, it would not be the last, but the first of such a series of demands; and if they were backed up by twenty or thirty votes, there would be found Governments weak enough and profligate enough to accede to them. He opposed this proposed waste of money in the interest both of England and Ireland, because the effect of the measure, if carried, would be to re-establish incumbered estates, notwithstanding the proud boast that their recent legislation had done away with incumbered estates in Ireland. £20,000,000 had been invested on the faith of that legislation through the medium of the Incumbered Estates Court in Ireland, and in the belief that henceforward the landlord was to have the full exercise of his rights; but now a re-actionary measure was proposed, the effect of which would be to throw Ireland back into her former state. They were told that the country was to be regenerated by the introduction of English capital, but the effect of this measure would not be to regenerate Ireland, but to drive capital out of the country. Again, how often had the House been told of the inexpediency of having the two countries governed by different laws? Yet the Bill would introduce a code of landed tenure into Ireland differing entirely from the English code. Then, the Irish people had been often reminded of the necessity of self-reliance; but this Bill taught them to look for Government grants, and rely on Government supervision; it raised futile hopes, it paralyzed self-exertion. The laws of political economy would be violated by this empirical measure, which, weakly assented to by a weak Government, would be powerless for good, but powerful for evil. You must legislate for Ireland upon principles, and not in deference to cries. It was in this way only that you could hope to rescue her from the reproach that had been cast at her—that she was, indeed, a member of the Empire, but a withered and distorted member, adding no strength to the body politic, and reproachfully pointed to by all who feared the power or envied the greatness of England.

CAPTAIN C. WHITE hoped the House would grant him that kind indulgence which was invariably extended to a new Member when he first addressed them. The Irish land question had assumed such large proportions as rendered it worthy of being considered as one of the great questions of the day. A great national demand had to be satisfied; and it must be the wish of all who had the interest of Ireland honestly at heart so to legislate upon this question that they might arrive at a permanent and not a merely temporary solution, and that contentment and confidence might be established throughout the country. They might depend upon it that the agitation of this question would not stop so long as half measures were put forward as a sop, and while the people were offered one thing when they asked for another, and their special requirement was ignored. Now, no Bill affecting to settle this question could be anything but eminently unsatisfactory to the people of Ireland, unless it to a certain extent recognised the necessity of a reasonable security of tenure. Fair security by lease was the demand of the Irish tenantry, and for these reasons:—First, that the tenant might be induced to lay out his money on the land; next, that he might be protected in case of any political difference with his landlord; and thirdly, that the security thus received might act as a check upon that hæmorrhage of emigration, which was so much to be deplored. With regard to the first of these reasons, the Bill suggested that the only reason why Irish tenants did not lay out their money upon the land was because they did not possess the necessary funds. But how did this square with the fact that £17,000,000 belonging to Irish tenants-at-will was now lying idle in the Irish banks? If that were the case, it was indubitable that those tenants-at-will must have some solid reason for not employing their capital in agricultural pursuits; and the reason was, that if they did they had no security that they would not be summarily ejected. As to the second reason—that such security would effectually protect the voter who differed politically with his landlord—that argument was worthy of great consideration;—indeed, it demanded it. The tenant, however, demanded to be protected in doing that which the State enjoined on him—namely, exercising the franchise according to his conscience. As his hon. Friend the Member for Kilkenny (Sir John Gray) had stated, the political question involved in this point was at the root of all the opposition with which every proposal for security of tenure was met. It was the love of political power that was called into play; and if it were possible to frame a measure which would combine security of tenure for the farmer with the retention of political power by the landlord, the opposition to it would dwindle into insignificance. They had heard a great deal of the rights of property. He hoped that in that House or anywhere else

he might never be betrayed into saying anything that would be so construed as to induce a belief that he did not recognise the importance of the rights of property; but he thought it would be just if the House would consent to look at this question, not from the English landlord, but from the Irish tenant point of view, and remember that property had its duties as well as its rights, and that one of the duties of the landlord was to endeavour to secure the happiness, contentment, and loyalty of the people on his estate. It was their bounden duty to make some sacrifices in this direction, and to cease to obstruct such salutary measures by an opposition based on selfish motives. They had been told that this was exceptional legislation, and that there was no reason why, as the English farmer did not ask for security of tenure as a sine quâ non, the Irish farmer should look for it. The cases, however, were not at all comparable. In England there was a trust and confidence—the growth of time—between the tenant and the landlord which did not exist at all in Ireland, where the tenants sprang from a different race to the landlords, and differed in creed, in form of worship, and in each others antipathies and sympathies. As to the Bill of the noble Lord, he would not presume to find fault with it. He thought the noble Lord was justly entitled to every credit for the feeling which animated him in bringing in this Bill. Without wishing to be offensive, however, he thought that in a general point of view it would be useless. In isolated instances the tenant might be benefited; but, in the aggregate, the tenants would not be able or willing to avail themselves of it; for the improvements by the tenant were generally made on the “spur of the moment,” and he liked to make them in his own way and at his own time. But, above all, he did find great fault with this Bill on account of the position it held in that House. He blamed the position of the Bill because it assumed to be a solution of the great Irish land question, and it would therefore lead people in Ireland to doubt the will of the House of Commons to grapple with this question, and they would not recognise in the Bill the relief which they were looking for. Having thanked the House for the patience with which they had listened to him, he concluded by expressing a hope that the time was not far distant when they would have such a liberal measure as would at once establish that contentment, that confidence, that trust in the people of Ireland which were so absolutely necessary, and that the question would be then settled, not temporarily, but permanently.

MR. M'KENNA : Sir, I rise to support the second reading of the Bill of the noble Lord. I have carefully studied its provisions and I regard it as a good measure. I wish it, however, to be understood that I cannot view it as a settlement of the tenant question, or as a substitute for a Bill to deal with tenure; as a Tenant Right Bill it would be of scarcely more value than the abortive measure of last Session. I cannot but remark, however, that the observations of the hon. Member for Maldon (Mr. Sandford) tell practically in support of the Bill, at least, as his reasons reach my understanding. The hon. Gentleman reminded the House that in 1852, when his ingenuous mind was first called to the contemplation of this subject, a measure which went still further was brought in by a Conservative Government, of which then, as now, Lord Derby was the head, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the noble Lord (Lord Naas) Secretary for Ireland. There is, however, as it appears to me, very little use in comparing the provisions of this Bill with any of its twenty or five-and-twenty predecessors which have died violent or natural deaths in this House. I regard the present Bill on its own merits, and on these merits I intend to support it. There is one feature in the Bill which especially recommends it to my support—namely, that its provisions descend to the level of the poor occupying tenant, and contemplate his reimbursement for the labour or the money he has expended in the permanent improvement of his farm. The 14th section of this Bill provides that in estimating the cost of improvements for which compensation may be had under this Act, the tenant's own labour and that of his family may be taken into account. When this Bill was introduced to the House in February last by the noble Lord, some hon. Members unacquainted with its provisions received it with very scanty favour; but for my part, I must remark that however short the present Bill may fall of their ideal of a proper measure, I search in vain through the statute books for any Act which proposes, by any machinery whatever, to bring the means of improvement within the reach of the poor tenant farmer as this Bill proposes to do. Perhaps, Sir, this is a dangerous admission; there are so many sticklers for precedent in this House, and outside so many who prefer that Parliament should for ever continue in the old grooves of legislation, and there are on the other hand so many disciples of that spurious political economy which we have heard to-night upheld by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Maldon, a fallacious system to which the interests of Ireland have been long systematically sacrificed, that it may be in a certain sense injudicious to acknowledge the real merits of this Bill. That risk, however, I must run or be silent; but the risk perhaps is small, for I believe the time has arrived when the claims of Ireland to exceptional remedial measures will be generally recognised in this House. It requires no great political erudition to demonstrate to this House the fallacies of that school of Liberal politicians who, under the pretence of applying equal laws to Ireland, have applied a like scale of taxation to Ireland and to Great Britain. The condition of Ireland has unfortunately become too well known to require arguments to prove to this House or to the world that she is poorer than any of the independent States of Continental Europe. It requires no lengthened arguments to establish the fact that in this age of free trade the producers of cattle, and corn, and butter, in Belgium, in France, and Germany, have as ready and as cheap access to the English markets for sale of their produce as the producers of the like in the South and West of Ireland. And if this be the case, as it is the case, are there not grounds for exceptional legislation for Ireland? Particularly when I remind the House that concurrently with the advance of free trade, that is to say, contemporaneously with the withdrawal of protection from the Irish producer, the Imperial Parliament raised the taxation on the population of Ireland from 10s. 1d. per head per annum in 1841 to £1 3s. 5d. per head per annum in 1861. I now refer to this subject cursorily only as a plea for exceptional legislation, of which I consider the present Bill a small instalment. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Maldon, said that he believed it would tend to promote the interests of Ireland if the name of Ireland were omitted from the Notice Papers of the House of Commons for ten years. I can only characterize observations of this nature as approaching as near to sneer at Ireland and her sufferings as the rules of the House will permit. There is another feature in this Bill which in my opinion distinguishes it favourably from any of the preceding land Bills. This Bill will enable the holder under a lease, even one nearly expired, to improve his farm and secure re-payment of his outlay. I find no trace of any similar concession to a tenant under lease in any former Bill, and I consider this provision in the present Bill, in the circumstances of Ireland, a most important feature. Now, what are the objections to the Bill which we have heard from quarters where we should rather look for support? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Louth, himself the author of a Bill last Session, or perhaps I may more properly describe him as the editor of that measure—perhaps editor is not a Parliamentary phrase—but it conveys more directly what I mean than the explanation that his Government took up a Bill from the hands of Irish Liberal Members, made their own of it when it accordingly fell through like its predecessors. Well, that right hon. Gentleman had no sooner heard this Bill announced than he took what he called a Treasury objection to the Bill, because it contemplated advancing money to tenants-at-will. But what force is there in this objection even from a Treasury point of view? It is not proposed to advance money to a tenant-at-will on his own mere security; it is proposed to advance money for the improvement of land on the security of the land improved, and what valid objection can be urged that may be termed a Treasury objection on the ground that a tenant-at-will has carried out the improvement which he is to get paid for? Another objection is urged that this Bill does not deal with tenure; but that objection can be answered by saying that the subject of this Bill is of sufficient importance to justify distinct legislation, and when it has been dealt with by Parliament there will be a principle affirmed which will in my opinion materially facilitate and cannot possibly retard a settlement of the tenant question. A third objection which I have heard, and the last which I remember, it appears to me, I may remark, that objections in this House generally resolve into threes—but this last objection is that the working of this Bill requires complicated machinery. Sir, I cannot conceive how it is possible to work

any measure of this nature with justice to all parties, and yet to avoid technicalities and details which to some minds always appear complicated. Technicalities—details—complications are not merely incidental to this Bill, they are inherent in the subject, and in my opinion the sooner those who desire a reform of the land laws make up their minds to overcome the difficulties in detail the sooner we shall arrive at a satisfactory solution. To illustrate the objections gravely to this Bill on the ground that its technicalities preclude a tenant receiving compensation, I must refer to the speech of the hon. and gallant Member for Tipperary. Well, what is his objection? He says improvements are for the most part carried out on the “spur of the moment,” and he says that a man who suddenly takes his labourers away from one description of working, digging potatoes for instance, and puts them to level fences cannot bring his improvements within the scope of this Bill, because he has not served the notice required by the Act. Does the hon. Gentleman believe that this is a serious objection, or does he make it seriously? I certainly cannot undertake to answer it seriously. As I have already said, this Bill is not a settlement of the land question, but it is a step towards it—it is a step towards the improvement of the tenant’s position—but neither would the Bill of last Session have been a settlement of the question, and of the two Bills, this one is infinitely a better measure. I do not say this in any desire to disparage the Bill of last year, but because I believe of the two Bills this is better to become law first. This Bill, if it becomes the law, will bring the means of improvement within the reach of the tenant in the most tangible and encouraging form, and it offers every reasonable inducement to the landlord to co-operate with and encourage his tenantry.

MR. BAGWELL said, that Irishmen were very glad to see their English friends, and to offer them such hospitality as was in their power, but they did not want to see English capitalists settle in that country. There were some in his own county, who had neither added to their own happiness nor that of those around them by settling in Ireland, and who, moreover, had not done much for the improvement of the land. What was wanted was a law to give the tenant security for the possession of the land as long as he was able to pay his rent, and until they got that the question would not be settled. Now, he did not believe that the House of Commons wanted to settle this question at present, and it would not be till certain changes took place as to the parties occupying the two sides of the House that they could look for a reform. It was probable that when hon. Gentlemen now in opposition returned to power they would introduce a Bill not much better than the present; and that when the Conservative party after two or three such changes returned to office they would see the necessity of taking the initiative as they had done upon the Reform question. At present ninety-nine out of every 100 of the tenants in Ireland were under the political control of their landlords. While this was the case there would never be any great improvement in Ireland; but they should have Irish difficulties and Irish grievances Session after Session. The Bills before the House proposed to grant money to the Irish tenantry. There were an immense number of holdings in Ireland under £15 a year value; and not one of the tenants would ever, in his opinion, come to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and ask for a shilling. The larger tenants had plenty of money of their own, and could till the land without the aid of public money. The grazing farmers wanted few buildings; for many of them held the opinion that stock was better out of doors than indoors. If the Government could be induced to legislate for the people of Ireland—by which he meant the people as distinguished from the landlords—he believed that something like a settlement could be arrived at. The longer this settlement was delayed the more sweeping would be the change when it came. Last year the Reform proposition stopped at £7; now we were landed at household suffrage. In the same way, on this Irish question, the landlords had refused anything beyond tenure at will; they refused the thirty-one years lease; let this refusal be continued, and the landlords might find themselves landed in fixity of tenure, with their property turned into a ground rental.

MR. SYNAN: The hon. Gentleman the Member for Maldon (Mr. Sandford) has taunted the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland with his inconsistency, and for what he calls his communistic principles and violation of political economy, as understood when the hon. Gentleman was a young and ingenuous Member of this House fourteen years ago, ingenui vultus puer ingenuique padoris. For my part I can see no violation of the principles of political economy in lending money to develop the agricultural industry of Ireland. I shall not taunt the noble Lord with his departure from the principles he so obstinately laid down last year in opposition to the Tenant Bill; on the contrary, I congratulate the noble Lord upon his conversion, and only regret that it is only a half-hearted one, and that he stops half way to the principles he avowed in 1852, and of the head of his Government in 1845. In 1845 Earl Derby (then Lord Stanley) brought in a Bill in the other House, after the Report on the Devon Commission was laid on the table, and although the present Bill follows the machinery of that Bill it departs from it upon the most important principle of notice for three classes of improvements. In the Bill of 1845 Lord Derby permitted the tenants to make all the improvements without notice. He made no distinction between different classes of improvements as this Bill does. In defending his Bill and this principle of not requiring a notice to the landlord, Lord Stanley said—

And again—

“In well-managed estates such a veto may do no harm and it may be well to leave things alone, but this Bill is not intended for well-managed estates but for ill-managed estates.”

And again he said—

“The tenant is entitled to have compensation by money if he is evicted, or to have a duration of his term.”—[See 3 Hansard, lxxxi. 1142.]

In my opinion there could not be a stronger condemnation of this Bill than the Bill and language of Lord Derby in 1845. I now come to the attempt of the same Government to deal with the question in 1852, and so far from standing upon the condition of requiring notice of improvements the Bill contained clauses, giving compensation for past improvements made within twenty-five years. And I may be allowed to say that the principle of retrospective compensation rests upon the most imperative justice, the soundest reason, and the highest authority. The practice in Ireland was, and always has been, for the tenants to make the improvements. Surely both reason and practice demanded that the Legislature should have protected that property which the tenants created, not against the will, but by the tacit consent of the landlord. Why was the landlord allowed to silently look on while the improvements were made, and afterwards (if any difference occurred between him and his tenant) appropriate to himself the improvements of the tenants? Would not such conduct be a violation of every principle of justice and fair dealing? And, yet, that has been done—nay, has been a practice, and the Judges of the Equity Courts in Ireland have been obliged to openly state from the bench, “that the law obliged them to administer injustice.” But there are other high authorities upon the subject, both Liberal and Conservative. Mr. Drummond, one of the wisest and most statesmanlike officials that was ever connected with Ireland, speaking on this subject, said—

Therefore legislation is more necessary for the past than for the future. Again, a noble Lord, not in favour of extreme views (Lord Dufferin), has said—

“Unless the past is first dealt with it will be impossible to come to a settlement with respect to the future.”

And Lord Donoughmore, in defending the Bill of 1854, and the clauses in it giving retrospective compensation, said—

“For various causes the landlords of Ireland had been in the habit of letting land simply and not farms. . . . whether something could not be done consistently with the rights of property to relieve this large class of persons in Ireland who had laid out their capital on bad titles.”—[3 Hansard, cxxxi. 4.]

Now, I ask the Government of Lord Derby why do they depart from the principle of the Bill of 1852? It must be on either of two grounds—namely, that the claims existing in 1852 have been destroyed by eviction or by occupation for thirteen years, and that no claims have sprung up ever since. Now, as to the first, I do not think it will be contended on the part of landlords that they can equitably get rid of a just claim for compensation by eviction. And no person conversant with the subject can allege that thirteen years’ occupation will pay for what it would require an occupation of thirty-one years, or forty-one years, or sixty-one years, according to the character of the improvement to exhaust. And, as to the second reason, every person acquainted with Ireland knows that claims have sprung up since 1852. I will come by-and-bye to another important particular in which the present Bill departs from the Bill of 1852. I leave the vacillating conduct and inconsistent policy of Governments upon this subject, and come to the great and important consideration of the imperative necessity for the settlement of this question, if you are to have peace, order, and prosperity in Ireland. My arguments on that head will not be based on any observations of my own, although I have considered the matter with some care, but on the authority of public men who, under the sense of responsibility, and with full knowledge of the facts, have pronounced this deliberate opinion that a satisfactory settlement of the land question is the foundation of all attempts at beneficial legislation for Ireland. The Report of the Devon Commission pronounces the state of the tenant question in Ireland—

“The foundation of almost all the evils by which the social condition of Ireland is disturbed, and to which is to be traced those feelings of mutual distrust which separate the classes of landlord and tenant and prevents an united exertion for the common benefit.”

That complaint has been repeated from 1844 to the present time by every statesman who proposed to deal with this question. And yet, notwithstanding this unanimous agreement of the necessity of settling the question, no real attempt (unless I may call that of Lord Derby in 1852 and that of the late Government so) has been made for a satisfactory settlement of this all-important question. I must refer the House to the language of the nobleman who, under the late Government, filled the office of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Lord Kimberley—a man whose character for statesmanlike views and great abilities is not confined to this Empire. Before he went to Ireland his views, I believe, were opposed to any change in the relation of the laws of landlord and tenant in Ireland. But when he went to that country and applied his strong intellect and full knowledge to the acquisition of the facts connected with the local condition of Ireland, what were his words? On his return from that country he thought it his duty to give to the House, of which he is so distinguished a Member, and to the Empire in which he filled so high an office, the results of his experience and of his observation while Governor of Ireland. He says—

“It is impossible for England to perform its duty towards Ireland as long as no attempt is made to deal with the important question of the tenure of land.”—[3 Hansard, clxxxiv. 2065.]

And again—

“Ireland is a country with which English statesmen have been singularly unsuccessful in dealing. But if we can devise any measure by which that country can be brought more into sympathy with the rest of the United Kingdom, by which we shall touch the hearts of the Irish people—which we have never yet touched—we shall add to the glory and strength of the Empire more than by any other measure we can possibly devise.”—[3 Hansard, clxxxiv. 2085.]

And yet, notwithstanding the concurrent testimony of all statesmen, from Edmund Burke to Lord Kimberley, Parliament has been found unable to devise any measure to settle this question and bring Ireland more in harmony with the Empire. Is it any wonder that under such circumstances there should be discontent in Ireland? No; but it would be a wonder if there was not discontent in that country. And there is universal discontent in Ireland, and that discontent is attributed by all classes—the farmer, the labourer, the shopkeeper, the clergyman—to the land question. They all argue thus:—Ireland is an agricultural country, and while the land question remains as it is and improvements are not encouraged and protected by the law,

“Want of employment will produce destitution, destitution turbulence, turbulence want of security, want of security want of capital, and want of capital want of employment.”

These words were used over twenty years ago by Mr. Nicholls, who was thoroughly acquainted with the social condition of Ireland, and they are as true of her condition this day as they were then. Here is a complete circle of causes and effects mutually acting and re-acting upon each other, and all springing from the great original cause—the social condition of Ireland. Is it surprising that there should be discontent in Ireland as long as the Government and Parliament of this Empire for the past twenty years have shown themselves either quite incapable of understanding the condition of Ireland, or quite unwilling to remedy the admitted grievances of that condition? The Government of the country stands inactive, or proposes such abortive measures as the present, while emigration goes on increasing, transferring the Irish population to America, producing and increasing in that part of the world that anti-British feeling which exhibits itself in raids upon Canada, and attempts at insurrection in Ireland. I tell this House that as long as you do not dry up the source of this poisonous stream it will flow on, increased by tributaries that will swell into a mighty flood that may some day endanger the institutions under which we live, and dissolve the integrity of the Empire. I know it has been said by some persons who profess to be statesmen—and among others by the noble Lord who has brought in this Bill—that the land question has nothing to say to this state of things. I am sorry I cannot agree with such sanguine, and in my opinion, short-sighted persons; and I think I will satisfy the House before I sit down that it is the cause—the original and continuing cause—of the discontents that have culminated in Fenianism. Who are the Fenians, the real, active, energetic, trained and dangerous Fenians, who labour day and night to propagate their principles and their system? They are the returned emigrants. Who are the emigrants? They are the agricultural population of Ireland who have been leaving Ireland at the rate of 120,000 a year since 1861, and at a much more rapid rate before that period. As long as you by your present system of land tenure in Ireland allow that emigration to go on—you are increasing the ranks of the Fenians and propagating Fenianism. But I know it is said by some the land question is not the cause of emigration and that the late Returns of the number of civil bill ejectments in Ireland from 1860 to 1866 proves that. But the actual state of facts showed the contrary. According to these Returns there were 14,086 notices under civil bill ejectments served from 1860 to 1866. Of these about 8,778 were actually executed, making with 719 haberes from the superior courts 9,497 evictions actually executed. But as the proportion of decrees executed to the total evictions was as one to three, it would follow that from 1860 to 1866, 28,491 families, comprising about 170,946 persons, were dispossessed. This was about one in four of the emigrants from Ireland during the same period. If we allow the same proportion for the 2,376,157 reduction in the population of Ireland from 1844 to 1861—and surely every person will admit the proportion must have been very much greater—we have about 1,000,000 reduction of our population in Ireland actually produced by eviction alone, or directly from the operation of the land question. But there is another way in which we may arrive at a proximate result, that is, by the number of small holdings that have disappeared in Ireland since 1844. In 1841 there were 563,235 holdings from one to fifteen acres, and in 1864 only 258,405, or a reduction of 304,830 small holdings, containing a population of over 1,500,000 persons. There has been, of course, an increase of holdings over thirty acres, but still, I think the result may be safely stated thus,—that 1,000,000 of the population of Ireland has been actually evicted from land by the direct operation of the landlords since 1841. I hope I have satisfied the House that it is not true, as often stated, that the reduction of the population in Ireland and the emigration from that country are not connected with this question; but that, on the contrary, a great part of that reduction and emigration is the direct consequence of the present state of the land question. I now come to the present condition of the holdings in Ireland, and to the consideration whether this Bill is a practical settlement of the land question. There are at this moment the following holdings in Ireland:—1 acre, 48,653; 1 to 5 acres, 82,037; 5 to 15 acres, 176,368; 15 to 20 acres, 136,578; 20 to 50 acres, 71,961; 50 to 100 acres, 14,547; 100 to 500 acres, 8,303. There are, consequently, 307,028 holdings under 15 acres, 443,606 under 30 acres, and only 156,576 holdings over 30 acres, that is only one-third. I assume that the remedy should be made co-extensive with the evil, and I ask what is the evil? You are not asked to legislate for the large tenants alone—on the contrary, I have the authority of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer for saying that the evil is the emigration of the Irish agricultural population. The right hon. Gentleman has called that emigration a “hæmorrhage to which a styptic is to be applied,” since the use of those remarkable words the organs of the Government in Ireland have been making political capital out of them, and they are placed at the head of all their articles. I hope that they will not turn out as “oracular” as other clap-trap responses from the Treasury Bench. I deceive myself very much if I do not show to the satisfaction of the House that this Bill instead of being a styptic will become the application of a “lancet” to increase the hæmorrhage. No man is more conversant with the subject than the noble Lord. No man knows the state of things in Ireland better. No Member of this House is more competent to prepare a proper Bill on the subject. It is the want of will, and not the want of ability, that prevents the noble Lord from bringing in a proper Bill. The noble Lord’s party in Ireland, from Lord Rosse down, do not want to settle this question. The tenant-at-will system is to be maintained, and to be maintained for political reasons. Now I ask the noble Lord this fair question—For whom, for what class of tenants does he intend this Bill? For the small class? They will not and cannot avail themselves of it. For the large class? They do not want it, and will not have it in its present condition. I have their authority for saying so. I hold in my hand resolutions in which they repudiate and reject it as worse even than the present system. This Bill cannot protect the small tenants under fifteen acres, and under thirty acres, who want protection, and it turns the farmers in Ireland of over thirty acres into stewards without the wages of stewards. I repeat, that any Bill on this subject must be made applicable to the present race of tenants in Ireland. That principle I hold to be an A B C political axiom. Is this Bill applicable to the present race of tenants in Ireland? Let us see. This Bill contains three classes of provisions—first, that tenants may apply to the Commissioners of Public Works for loans to be appointed under the Act by memorial. Commissioner may accept or reject, and if he accepts, the work is to go on under his superintendence and inspection, and if he approves of the work done he may give a certificate charging the form with the loan at 5 per cent for thirty-five years to be paid by the tenant. Second. If the tenant wishes to make the improvement at his own expense he may also apply by memorial, and if the commissioner approves, he may grant a certificate as in the former case. Thirdly. Neither the tenant nor commissioner can make or sanction improvements, first, to make fences; second, to make farm roads; third, or to build, re-build, or to enlarge farm holdings. Now, I ask the noble Lord this simple question. Will any of the tenants under fifteen acres apply under this Bill, or if they did or could would the commissioner approve of the memorial? The noble Lord is more ignorant of the class of tenants I mention, if he answers in the affirmative, than I believe him to be. Nay, I ask, will any of the tenants under thirty acres do so? The noble Lord knows well that they will not. What is the number of these tenants? 404,606, or two-thirds of the entire of the tenants of Ireland. Thus you exclude by your Bill the very people for whom legislation is most necessary, and their number is two-thirds of the whole tenantry of Ireland.

Could there be a greater condemnation of this Bill? Again, I ask, will the tenants between thirty acres and fifty acres apply by memorial under this Act? I distinctly say no. And what is their number? 71,961:—so that the only class of tenants this Bill would practically apply to would be the 70,000 tenants of fifty acres and upwards—that is, one-seventeenth of all the tenants in Ireland, and the very class that are independent, and do not want, and will not have such a law as this. But suppose the fifty acre tenant does apply under this Act, what will be the consequence? He wants to drain twenty acres of his farm, and asks for £150, the work is done in two or three years; for the three or four first years, during which the tenant is obliged to pay the rent-charge, the work does not pay. At the end of that period the farm becomes more valuable, perhaps one-half, perhaps one-third. The tenant is a tenant-at-will; the landlord is a bad and hard landlord, or falls out with his tenant, and he says to the tenant, “I must get an increase of rent or the farm;” and he compels the tenant under the 11th section to apply to the commissioner to buy the rent-charges. Thus he gets possession without paying 1s., and has only to pay the residue of the rent-charge for the residue of thirty-five years. This I call a premium on eviction. Is this the styptic of the Chancellor of the Exchequer? I call it a new way of increasing the hæmorrhage and depopulating Ireland. But, it will be said, no landlord of any character will do so? I answer in the words of Lord Derby in 1845—“We are not making laws against good landlords, but against bad landlords.” If this Bill became law in its present condition, and if the tenantry of Ireland availed themselves of it (as they will not) the effect would be to get rid of all the holders of fifteen acres, and consolidate farms. I say and repeat, the effect would be to get rid of 307,628 holdings, or from 1,000,000 to 2,000,000 of people, the very number Lord Rosse says must be got rid of. But there is no fear of such a consequence, for I tell the noble Lord this Bill never will become law in its present shape, or, if it does, it will be just as worthless as the Bill of 1860; for the Irish tenants will not have it. If the noble Lord is sincere; if he is in earnest upon this subject; if he is honestly disposed to settle this question, let him introduce a clause that the tenant shall not be disturbed for the thirty-five years during which he is paying the rent-charge except for non-payment of the original rent. Why should not the tenant remain in possession while he is receiving the value and paying the costs of the improvement? If the noble Lord does what I ask him, I promise him that his Bill will not only pass, but be received with gratitude, and universally adopted and acted upon by the Irish people. Oh! what a change would come over the face of the country if the tenants were allowed to spend the £17,000,000 now locked up in the joint-stock banks, and expend it on the improvement of their farms which they were to occupy for the term during which they were paying the rent-charge under this Bill. If asked, what do I propose? I answer, turn this into a Tenure Bill as well as a Compensation Bill. This great question involving the prosperity—nay, the lives of a great portion of the Irish people, cannot be settled by a one-sided measure—you must make it complete. Protect the tenant in his occupation, or give him compensation, but do not give a compensation that will be an inducement to the landlord and a power in his hand to deprive the tenant of his farm or compel him to emigrate. I tell the House that the interests of the Empire demand that there should be a stop put to further emigration from Ireland. And I call upon the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to make good his words. Let him not—

When I say that this question cannot be settled unless you deal with the subject of tenure I speak from high authority. I have the authority of the head of Her Majesty's Government. Lord Derby, in 1845, said—

“The tenant is entitled to have compensation by money if evicted, or to have a duration of his term.”

O'Connell (who knew the condition of the Irish tenantry perhaps better than any other man) said, in 1846—

“The tenant should have the full value of his labour and improvements unless he gets a renewed lease.”

And again, speaking on the Bill of 1846—

“The attempt ought to be made to give the occupiers fixity of tenure by lease, words frequently assailed, but implying what was most desirable to accomplish for Ireland.”

But I require no authority for such a proposition; it is the unanimous opinion of the Irish people—it is the universal voice of that nation demanding from this House

the liberty and right of living in their native land. I beseech the House to be no longer deaf to that voice. I call upon them in the name, and in the interest of this great Empire, to arrest the tide of emigration, and disloyalty, and disaffection that is bearing away the Irish race from that island which is bound to England by the golden link of the Crown, but which this House is bound to connect with England by the ties that spring from the heart, the bonds that are formed by a common interest, a common prosperity, and a common glory. I have endeavoured to show to this House the nature of the measure that is demanded for the settlement of this question. I have proved by the Bills of former Governments, and the authority of the statesman who is at the head of the present Government, that the Bill is defective, illusory, and in some respects full of danger. I have taken no party view—I have spoken from my knowledge of the state of things in Ireland and of the character of the measure that is required to settle this question. Nobody knows better than the noble Lord the Chief Secretary that I have a right to speak upon this question, and that I speak with a certain degree of authority. On the last occasion I addressed this House upon the Tenant Bill of the late Government, I expressed my opinion freely, fully, and impartially. Nullius addictus in verba jurare magistri. I am supported by the authority of a great statesman in saying, “that the laws that are not backed by the general conscience of the community can have no permanent effect,” and I now tell this House that this Bill in its present shape is not backed by the conscience of the Irish people for whom it is intended, and can therefore have no permanent effect.

MR. POLLARD - URQUHART said, that this question had been discussed for upwards of twenty years in that House, and though different Governments had expressed themselves ready to stand or fall by other questions in which the Irish people felt little sympathy, few had been willing to stake their existence as an Administration on a matter like the present, which was deeply interesting to the people of Ireland, and he hoped that like the Reform Bill, which had been only sixteen years upon the carpet, it would at last come to be treated independently of party considerations. He had learnt by experience to take whatever was acceptable in any Bill irrespective of what party it came from, though the measure itself might not contain all that he could have desired; and, after carefully studying the present Bill, he must say that, though it would not form a settlement of the question, it contained a great many elements of good. Besides enabling tenants to make improvements by the aid of a loan from the Government, it is also provided that compensation should be given them for certain improvements made by themselves without the consent of the landlord. That provision was a great step in advance. He hoped the noble Lord would consent somewhat to extend the period of charge beyond thirty-five years for houses. In Scotland there existed machinery by which landlords were enabled to borrow money to build houses and make a perpetual charge on the land; and if the noble Lord would consent to engraft such a principle on this Bill, altered so as to allow tenants to avail themselves of it with the consent of their landlords, he would confer a great benefit on the farmers of Ireland, and make this measure go much further towards a final settlement of the question. The building of a house, for instance, was an improvement which not only involved labour, but an actual expenditure of money, and a tenant would hardly be justified in laying out money in building a house for which his family would lose all claim to compensation at the end of thirty-five years. The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Gregory) had said a great deal about the encouragement of leases; and he believed if they were more general the solution of the question would be much more easy; but he doubted whether it was altogether wise to mix up the two subjects, because the benefits contemplated by the Bill were for those who had not the security of leases. But that, after all, was a matter to be considered in Committee. He believed the more this question was considered, the more it would be found that so far from their interests being antagonistic, when landlords gave to their tenants such a security as induced them to improve, it would be found quite as beneficial to the one as to the other.

MR. PEEL DAWSON said, although this Bill had not created much excitement, or any great enthusiasm, it would, if passed, be the means of effecting great changes of a novel and very important character; and he considered it the duty of the House to take care that those changes were unaccompanied with any violent or dangerous innovations. It was with very great regret that in this matter, to a certain extent, he must differ from his noble Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and any support he could give the Bill must be contingent on the assurance he received from him, or some other Member of the Government, that the improvements alluded to in Clause 7 should be placed on one uniform basis, and that the Commissioner should grant no certificate if the landlord continued to object to any of the six several heads enumerated in the Interpretation Clause. But he was not so sanguine as to entertain the belief that, even if the Bill passed, there was any chance of preventing further agitation in Ireland upon the subject. There were those who would be content with no reasonable or rational settlement short of the confiscation of all proprietary rights, and who looked to the possession of the soil, whether through Fenian or other agencies, without the control of the landlord or any acknowledgment of their title even in the shape of rent. To such no legislation would be acceptable or satisfactory; and this spirit was at the root of all Irish disorganization and discontent. He had no complaint to make of the tone of the Irish Members; but he could not for one moment sanction or encourage any such wild views as consistent with rational legislation on the question. He trusted that Parliament would not consent to any arbitrary pressure on landlords, or to the withdrawal from them of that authority and control which were necessary for the management of their estates. Permissive tenant right as existing in Ulster had, in his opinion, been productive of great advantage both to tenant and landlord, and sorry should he be to see it limited either in practice or by legislation, and it was very seldom that in changes of tenancy any case of grievance was either authenticated or substantiated. He did not collect from the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Gregory) whether his proposal meant to provide compulsorily for leases; if so, he certainly could not join him in advocating concession to that effect. He must, however, express his decided preference for the system of tenure that existed in Scotland, where short leases of nineteen and twenty-one years were given direct to the tenant. He believed that was the best arrangement that could be made between the two parties, and afforded sufficient opportunity for realizing all the solid improvements made at the tenant's expense. The real cause why this system had not been extended to Ireland was the minute subdivision of land into small farms, and the inability of landlords to undertake the erection and maintenance of such buildings as would be subsidiary to the present system. He was once much struck by the observation of an eminent Divine, well known in Belfast, who proposed to settle the question of tenant right in two words, and those magic syllables were — "give leases." He hoped that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Galway was founded on the principle of voluntary leases; he should willingly give his adherence to the principles of the Bill, provided the alterations embodied in the Amendments of his hon. Colleague (Sir Frederick Heygate) were introduced. These, he thought, would correct any seeming injustice in the Bill. Still, he did not anticipate that it would become widely operative. He hoped to receive such assurances from the noble Lord as would enable him to consider the principle of the Bill an honest and trustworthy one; and under such circumstances, but under these circumstances only, he should hope to see its future progress steady and secure, and its enactment accomplished.

THE O'DONOGHUE said, he wished to correct a mistake into which the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Gregory) had inadvertently fallen in erroneously attributing the saying that Fenianism could not exist in Ireland when butter was £4 the firkin to Mr. James O'Connell. That opinion, so far from having been expressed by Mr. J. O'Connell, had given him considerable annoyance. He gathered from the course pursued by the Government in this Bill either that they were incapable of dealing with the land question, or that they would not deal with it, or that the land question was understood neither by the Irish people nor by the Government, and that it neither could nor would be the subject of legislation. If Her Majesty's Government meant to avow their incapacity or their want of inclination to deal with the Irish land question, he would not dispute the accuracy of that avowal or censure their candour. If, however, the Government, by declaring that this Bill did not attempt to deal with the land question, meant to convey to the House the impression that there was no such question as the land question, or that that phrase had no well defined meaning, they were entirely wrong. In his opinion, however, the Bill dealt in a large manner with the land question. That question consisted of two distinct parts which, although closely related, were not necessarily contained the one in the other, and could be dealt with separately. The first and infinitely the most important concerned the improvement of the condition of the people who dwelt upon the land, and that portion of the subject was left untouched by the present Bill. The second related to the mere improvement of the soil. The latter was the portion of the land question with which the Bill proposed to deal. Her Majesty's Government were evidently of opinion that the occupiers had no right to a permanent interest in the land, and they brought in a Bill founded upon the preposterous assumption that although the tenants would have no permanent interest in the land they would invest their savings and their labour in its improvement. Tenants would soon learn that the Bill offered them no security for the capital it proposed to lend them for the purpose of improving the land. What security had they that as soon as the improvements were effected their rents would not be raised, if they were not at once evicted? Depend upon it if the Bill were passed it would soon become a dead letter, as none of the occupiers would care to avail themselves of its provisions. The Bill would lead the House to suppose that the real and sole want of the Irish tenants was want of capital, whereas their real and sole want was security for their capital when invested in the improvement of the soil. If the Irish tenants believed that they would be enriching themselves instead of somebody else, they would soon show that they lacked neither capital nor energy. The framers of the Bill, in effect, said to the tenants, "We are aware of your position—we know your landlord can turn you out, and we are resolved that he shall have that power as long as he thinks proper; but as we are anxious that the land shall be brought into a high state of cultivation, we will lend you money by which you will be enabled to till, and drain, and fence, and clear your land more effectually, and when you have worked and strained every nerve to enable you to repay the principal and interest of the sum we have lent you we shall be unable to tell you that your condition has been in any way improved; but this we can tell you—your farms will be more valuable to your landlords than they were before; they will bring a higher rent, and they will realize a larger sum in the Incumbered Estates Court." Such was the anxiety of the occupiers to obtain some security for the possession of their farms that they would gladly borrow under this Bill if by doing so they could obtain for their tenure even a moderate amount of stability. No tenants, however, could avail themselves of the provisions of the Bill without the consent of their landlords; and therefore they could not avail themselves of the measure in order to defeat or restrain the system of eviction which Her Majesty's Government held to be so essential to the prosperity of Ireland. No more unjust charge could be brought against the Bill than to say that it endangered the rights of the landlords; because it left both the landlords and tenants in their present position, as it left the latter in complete dependence upon the former for everything that made life desirable. The Bill held out to occupiers that which they would accept if they were utterly blind to their own interests, seeing that by borrowing the money to improve their landlord's property they would be merely increasing the rent they had to pay. He thought it ought to be clear to the House that such an attempt to deal with Irish farmers as if they were mere labourers was as unjust as it was shortsighted. There was not a single clause in the Bill on which a man of business or sense could rest his expectation of an adequate return. The Bill might be useful to tenants who had leases; but in Ireland leases to tenants were rare and could not be taken into account in considering the general effect of the Bill on the state of Ireland. It was impossible that the Bill could lead to the results anticipated by those who advocated it. The improvement of the land and the improvement of those who dwelt upon it were inseparable questions. Without the assistance of occupiers the land could not be improved, and the occupiers would not aid in any improvement unless it was made clear to them that they must be substantially benefited by these improvements. If they improved the condition of the people—if they gave occupiers a certainty of tenure and placed them beyond the caprice of landlords, they would soon bring their holdings into a high state of cultivation, and distrust and disaffection would disappear in Ireland. The great obstacle that had thwarted all their attempts at legislation on this question was tenancy-at-will. Sweep that away, and a new state of things would spring up. Tenancy-at-will had been an impassable barrier between the wisdom of Parliament and the wants of the people, for whatever Acts Parliament in its wisdom might have passed there was between Parliament and the people a power which virtually paralysed their action. How could they wonder at the disturbance and discontent of Ireland when the whole fabric of Irish society rested on the unstable foundation of tenancy-at-will? In a nation of tenants-at-will men could not be said to have either a home or a country. He was convinced that before any improvement could be effected in the condition of the people it would be necessary to abolish tenancy-at-will, and to substitute in its place security of tenure. What was wanted was a simple Bill which would effect that object. Nothing short of it would satisfy the Irish tenant, tranquillize the country, stimulate industry, or place Ireland in the road to prosperity. As it was, the Irish tenant felt that under no circumstances could his position be a worse one, and he, as a natural consequence, anxiously looked to the possibility of any change. He could not but regard the present state of the land question in Ireland with alarm, and he earnestly trusted that the House would deal with this subject justly and courageously. He should, on the present occasion, give his vote in favour of the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Galway, feeling that that Amendment, at all events, pointed in the right direction.

MR. PIM said, he yielded to none in his conviction of the importance of this question to Ireland. It was, in fact, a question of much greater interest to the people of Ireland than the question of Reform was to the people of England. He did not think he was in the least exaggerating the case when he said that nineteen-twentieths of the population of that country felt that the laws relating to land were unjust in principle and injurious in their operation to the public welfare. It was not a question between Catholic and Protestant. The majority of the complaints which he received emanated from Protestants, and, in his opinion, the Protestant tenantry of Ireland had suffered more than the Roman Catholic tenantry; but the Protestant tenantry did not talk so much about it. The Protestant tenantry in the South of Ireland had diminished within the last fifty years in a larger proportion than the Roman Catholic tenantry. It was poor satisfaction to know that the evils which this Bill proposed to remedy were complained of by Protestants and Roman Catholics alike, still it was pleasing to reflect that the question was not a religious one. He did not believe that the interest of the landlord and the interest of the tenant were antagonistic. The land laws stood greatly in need of revision, and if that were done in a proper spirit, the position both of the landlords and of the tenants would be improved, and at the same time the condition of the country would be improved. He expected that the course which would eventually be taken would be one which would give a legal recognition to the rights of the tenants, and which would also afford increased facilities for maintaining the rights of the landlord. Some had objected to this Bill on the ground that it was special legislation; but that objection would not stand. The Montgomery Act was a case of special legislation for Scotland, and it had worked well for nearly 100 years. Another case of special legislation for Scotland was the Bill brought in by the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire, with respect to the Game Laws, which proposed to give tenants a right to recover compensation for damage to their crops from the increase of rabbits, hares, and game on their farms. That was special legislation; but certainly he did not object to it. One of the two Bills introduced by the noble Lord was based upon the Scotch statute—the Montgomery Act—to which he had already referred, but it was not nearly so liberal; and he should prefer to extend the operation of that Act to Ireland rather than adopt the measure of the noble Lord. At the same time, he thought that the noble Lord had, by the introduction of these Bills, done service to the land question in Ireland. With respect to the Bill now before them—the Tenants Improvements Bill—he did not think it would meet the requirements of the Irish land question; but still, if certain changes were made in it, which he hoped to see introduced in Committee, he thought it would be a good and useful measure. The hon. Member for Tralee had shown in a very striking manner some of the objections to the provisions of the Bill; and the principal one was that there was no security for the tenant. He scarcely saw how the Bill could be made to work properly unless the security of a lease was given to the tenant. So strong did this objection appear to Mr. Caird, who might be considered an authority on the question, that he proposed, where the tenant had no lease, that the Legislature should secure him one for thirty-four years, while the loan from the Government was in the course of being re-paid. If some such arrangement were not come to there could be no doubt that the tenant would run the risk of having his rent raised according to the improvements effected. But, notwithstanding these objections, he hoped that the Bill would be read a second time, and that nothing would interfere with its passing into law. It would benefit only a small proportion of the tenantry of Ireland, but he was not sure that it would not benefit a large proportion of the land of Ireland, and he was sure that the land could not be improved without its producing a reflex operation upon those who tilled the land. He had received a letter from a tenant farmer, who said—

“I hope the Bill will be in some points amended, but not defeated, and I shall feel it a great loss if, by a change of Government or otherwise, the Bill should be let drop. There are four or five persons, including myself, in this neighbourhood who would at once act upon it.”

The writer went on to express his opinion that it was

“With the middle and higher, but not with the lower, class of farmers that the Bill would be useful.”

Whether the person from whose letter he had quoted held a lease or not he was unable to say, but he lived under a landlord in whom he placed great confidence, and under whose family he and his predecessors had held the same farm for more than 200 years. To the other Bill introduced by the noble Lord—the Land Improvement and Leasing Bill—several objections might be urged. Thus, the 13th clause enabled the successor to a property to call for a re-examination of what had taken place at the instance of the limited owner, even though an annuity might have been granted. To him it seemed that whatever inquiry took place in the first instance, and especially where an annuity had been granted, should be final. Again, with regard to the time allowed, it was scarcely to be supposed that any person would spend his own money and be satisfied with a twenty-five years' annuity, when he could borrow money from the Treasury and be allowed thirty-five years for re-payment. Another objection was that a limited owner was to be bound to have the consent of his successor before he could grant a lease in certain cases. Within whatever limits the ostensible proprietor could legitimately act, he ought to be at liberty to do so without any necessity for consulting the successor or any third party, otherwise the tenant could never be certain that he was getting a valid lease, or that all legal formalities had been complied with. The principle of both the Bills introduced by the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland he believed to be sound; and he thought with certain modifications they were likely to prove useful to the country. But they should be freed from some of the difficulties that at present surrounded their working; and with that object he appealed to the noble Lord to allow them both to be referred to a Select Committee. The Montgomery Act was passed for Scotland nearly 100 years ago, and on looking at that Act he found that every important clause was introduced with a preamble which ran thus:—“Whereas, such an improvement will be beneficial to the public.” That was the true point of view to look at these matters—to be guided not so much by the interest of the landlord or even of the tenant, but by the interests of the community at large. It was as much a matter of equity to recognise the rights of the landlords as those of the tenants. But hitherto legislation had not respected the rights of the tenants; and the only way in which lawyers could protect the tenant was to throw difficulties in the way of enforcing the legal rights of the landlord, so that, in point of fact, the operation of the law was injurious to both.

SIR FREDERICK HEYGATE said, he felt it his painful duty to oppose the present Bill; but he would not do so on the ground taken by the hon. Member for Maldon (Mr. Sandford), for he felt that any one who held the difficult and responsible office of Irish Secretary in such times as the present might well be allowed to change his mind. For his part he gave the noble Lord the present Chief Secretary every credit for sincerity, and he believed he had brought forward this measure with a sincere desire to benefit the people of Ireland; but the noble Lord could hardly expect those who supported his Resolution of last year to be ready with equal facility to follow him in the course he was now taking. In a case of this kind it required the strongest reasons to induce him to support a measure which appeared to him to be destructive of the rights of property, by allowing one man to carry out improvements on another person's property without that other person's consent. Disguise the matter as they might—and the noble Lord had shown great skill in doing so—still the fact remained that these improvements were to be made without the landlord's consent. If this proposition were agreed to—if the landlord was to be put aside with respect to one class of improvements, why should he not be put aside with respect to all others? If Parliament allowed the tenant, by this Bill, to borrow money for drainage without the consent of his landlord, next year the demand would be made for the extension of that power to the case of other improvements. He was one who admitted the necessity of stopping the emigration from Ireland, which he regarded as one of the greatest evils that could befall a country; but it did not appear to him that this Bill was calculated to effect that desirable object. He had looked carefully at the Bill, with every desire to improve it, and he had put several Amendments on the paper, but the more he looked at it the more he was convinced that it was not only objectionable in principle, but also that it was one the working of which would be impracticable. If it were passed, he was sure it would remain a dead letter. The subject was not one to be approached in the spirit of party or political feeling, but should be dealt with in a spirit of compromise. The first improvement named in the Bill was draining. Why draining should be left to the tenant, however, he did not understand, because in England if draining were so left it was usually done badly. Nor could he understand the provisions of the Bill with respect to reclaiming land. No doubt that was often well done under a just landlord, who took care that the tenant was compensated either in money or by length of tenure, but it sometimes happened that mountain land was reclaimed which had better been left in its original state. The Bill was to be carried out by the Commissioners, and an enormous staff of those officials would be required if there was to be no limit as to the size of the farm in respect of which application was to be made; because, according to the noble Lord, there were 608,869 holdings in Ireland. If, on the other hand, the House did what he thought would be right, and limited the applications to farms of over £50, as there were only 35,955 holdings which came under that category, and as there would be a further deduction in respect of lands on which money had already been borrowed for draining, the operation of the Bill would be infinitesimal. Again, as to the maintenance of the improvements, how was it possible in an immense number of small farms to ascertain what extent of depreciation had taken place? He thought that any endeavour to come at the fact would create endless ill-feeling between landlord and tenant. Clause 14 of the Bill referred to the compensation to the tenant for labour. This in many cases would be very proper; on the other hand, there was great liability to abuse. He wished to know what was to be done in case it should turn out that a small farm was not able to repay the money advanced on it? Was it to be sold out of the middle of an estate? If not, was the Treasury to lose the advance? They had heard of the success of the small farm system in Switzerland, Holland, and Belgium; and it was argued that this system acted as a check upon emigration; but it should be remembered that in all those countries there was industrial occupation for the people apart from the cultivation of their farms. It was impossible for landlords in Ireland to act upon a general principle in erecting farm buildings, in consequence of the inevitable consolidation of small farms, the result of an increase in prices. In his opinion, the best plan was to let the landlords and the tenants settle their arrangements between themselves, without giving the landlord any special advantages. He should simply have the remedy of any other creditor. The prosperity of Ireland had everything to do with this cry about the land question; a bad harvest gave fresh impetus to the agitation upon the subject, but the best way was to deal with the interests of Ireland on general principles; it was by promoting the general prosperity of Ireland and not by lending money on small farms that the question could be brought to a satisfactory solution. The largest portion of the agricultural population of Ireland were the labourers; but the House had heard nothing of them. As to the question of leases, he did not believe that the granting of them would enable landlords to obtain higher rents than they at present received. Not long ago, indeed, the whole of Ireland was under lease, and the consequence was subletting and bad farming in every direction. Irish landlords were always spoken of as if they were devoid of common sense because they had not adopted the Scotch system of nineteen years, or anything of the kind. With regard to leases of thirty-two years, they would long before their expiry be converted into perpetuities, and the example of the Bishop's lands would be followed. In his opinion a system of leases for ten years or thereabouts would be best suited for Ireland; for he concurred in what had been stated that evening to the effect that it would be a good thing if Irish tenants had a permanent interest in the land. That and a system of equitable agreements in writing between landlord and tenant would probably meet the requirements of the case. He hoped the noble Lord (Lord Naas) would withdraw his Bill, which had met with no support on either side of the House. The passing of such a measure would have the effect of driving capital away from the country. Hon. Gentlemen who had spoken on this subject seemed to forget how immensely trade had been developed in Belfast and other parts of the North of Ireland; that coal could be imported from England, and that there was any amount of water power for the establishment of manufactures. They seemed to forget that the climate was favourable for other industries. Ireland should not be treated as if it could only be an agricultural country. Why, around Belfast the number of spindles in the flax trade had doubled within the last few years. The country ought to depend not upon agriculture alone, but on those other industries which had made other nations great and rich.

MR. MONSELL said, that the position of the several parts of Ireland in respect of the relations of landlord and tenant were very different. If tenant right existed in the South and South-West as it did in the North the necessity for legislation on the subject would be very much restricted. The hon. Baronet who had just addressed the House (Sir Frederick Heygate) had referred to the dangerous position of society in Ireland at the present time. Now, it was precisely because discontent was widely prevalent that he ventured to appeal to his noble Friend opposite (Lord Naas) not to give up the Bill, but to assent to the Resolution of the hon. Member for Galway. The state of the country was most dangerous, and discontent prevailed in three parts of Ireland. One section—a small and insignificant one—placed no trust in Parliament, and were determined to resort to physical force. Another section representing the intelligence of the West and South-West of Ireland, feeling discontented with their position, trusted to the promises of Parliament made for twenty-one years by successive Governments. The discontent of the South-West had its rise in the insecurity of tenure. Tenants-at-will felt no security that they would be left in possession of their holdings. The statement of the hon. Baronet (Sir Frederick Heygate) as to leases being formerly granted in Ireland was not altogether correct, the fact being that the country was divided among middle men who had long leases, and who let out the land to the actual occupiers of the soil. The system of tenancies-at-will had been condemned by Lord Macartney, Edmund Burke, Arthur Young, and other eminent men; and the Devon Commission reported that one of the principal evils they had to complain of was want of proper tenure. The hon. Member for Maldon (Mr. Sandford) had remarked that people got on very well in England without leases, and asked why it was that they were considered necessary in Ireland. Now, hon. Gentlemen should bear in mind that there was a great difference between tenants-at-will in the two countries. In the first place, improvements effected by landlords in England were not effected by the landlords in Ireland; and secondly, there was not in Ireland that community of feeling and mutual trust between landlords and their tenants which was so general in England. The tenant in Ireland was in the position of a gentleman who went to hire an unfurnished house, and set about painting it. Would any wise man proceed to spend money to any extent upon an unfurnished house without a lease? Lord Rosse, writing on this subject, had said—

“Landlords in Ireland do not give leases to their tenants on account of political differences between them. They wish to keep their tenants under subjection. The apprehensions of landlords as to the effects of giving leases are not unreasonable; and, so long as those apprehensions exist, landlords will be reluctant to give leases.

This passage struck at the root of the objection to giving leases in Ireland. The Rev. Dr. Moriarty, the Roman Catholic Bishop of Kerry, said—

“Why leases are not given is not a matter of speculation, but a fact. They are withheld in order to concentrate political power in the landlord, and to annul the elective franchise; and this is done for the further purpose of maintaining the ascendancy of which the centre and the support is the Established Church, and which is fast embracing the whole social system.”

He was not raising the question of the Established Church, but he was showing that there were reasons other than those connected with the land which prevented landlords giving leases. He hoped the Government would explain whether their objection to the Resolution was founded upon an idea that it in any way touched the rights of property. It did not propose to interfere with contracts ; it left landlords and tenants free to make them ; and all that it proposed was that when there was no written contract that which should be presupposed to exist by law was that which would be for the benefit of society in Ireland—namely, a lease for whatever period might be considered best. This would only be analogous to the law disposing of the property of a person who died intestate in the manner which the State deemed best for the good of society. He warned hon. Members that if they did not consent to the moderate proposition contained in the Resolution the time might not be far distant when they would have to submit to something far more stringent. ["Oh, oh!"] Those who said "Oh!" opposed a moderate measure of Reform last year, and were now obliged to submit to a far more sweeping measure, and so upon this question they might have to come to the House and say they had got a measure which would not work, and must impose one far more extreme in character. He entreated the Government to consider the present circumstances of Ireland and not to reject the Resolution.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON desired to make an earnest appeal to the House. This Bill had been five hours under discussion, and every kind of extraneous matter had been imported into it. He appealed to the House to consider the real bearings of the measure, and not allow their minds to be carried away by the arguments of those who did not venture openly to oppose the measure, but tried to meet it with covert opposition. Let hon. Members consider the question fairly before them. For more than twenty years they had been told in that House that the tenantry of Ireland were not able to obtain compensation for the improvements they made on their holdings. Year after year they had been told that they must pass a fair compensation Bill—one which would meet the wants of the case when men were suddenly deprived of the proceeds of their industry and capital by the arbitrary action of the landlord. This Bill had been brought forward for the purpose of meeting that want. The House was called upon to say "Aye" or "No" to a distinct proposition whether such compensation were just and desirable, and he trusted hon. Members would not allow themselves to be led away upon any false issues. The question was whether, when a tenant had expended his money and his labour upon land, the Imperial Parliament should say that he should receive a fair equivalent for what he had expended. Yet, in limine, during five hours every objection had been urged against the Bill. He thought industrious tenants in Ireland had good reason to say that their loud-talking friends were not supporting their interests in the course of conduct they were following. The Bill, however, touched the susceptibilities of many in the House who were alarmed for the rights of landlords, and who, notwithstanding their former eloquence on the protection which the tenant needed, now raised false issues and endeavoured to prevent the House coming to an honest decision. The hon. Member who moved the Amendment said that he would not prejudge the Bill ; but, at the same time, he must know perfectly well that if the Amendment were carried it would be fatal to the Bill. This was not a Bill which was proposed to settle the whole land question ; but it was proposed as a straightforward attempt to settle some evident grievances. The title of the Bill stated that its object was to promote the improvement of land by occupying tenants by securing them money compensation. The tenantry were not capitalists, but they expended their labour on the land, and there was in the Bill a distinct provision that labour should be recognised and paid for. The Bill did not profess to settle all the questions affecting landlord and tenant. But there being a grievance and an injustice, the Government now proposed to remedy it, whereupon the so-called friends of the tenant drew a red herring across the scent and raised all manner of false issues. The question of leases was one to be entertained on its own merits ; it might be properly raised, but should not be thrust forward in order to divert public attention from the subject-matter of the Bill. It had been said that leases were withheld for political reasons. Now, he had considerable knowledge of the North, and some, too, of the South of Ireland, and he could meet this statement with a positive contradiction. The hon. Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Bryan) said that this Bill was a feeble bid for popularity ; but in almost the same breath the hon. Member who made this assertion added that no tenant would take advantage of the Bill. Of course, there was no consistency in such an argument. The hon. Member for Tipperary (Captain White), who had spoken with so much promise, seemed to think that the Bill would not enable tenants to employ profitably the £17,000,000 of money which they now had in the banks. But that was not so. They might, if they chose, put the whole of this money into the land. The Bill did not make the tenants merely a paltry offer of £1,000,000, but would give them security for the repayment of any money of their own invested by them in the soil. Several hon. Members talked of this Bill as not being a competent attempt to deal with the great land question, but none of them stated definitely what that question was. The House had no clear idea of what the great land question was, but they did know what compensation meant: yet when the Government proposed to deal with this definite question hon. Members objected because the Bill would not do what it did not profess to do. If those hon. Members did not like the principle of compensation to tenants, why did they not say so? He himself did approve of that principle, and therefore he supported the Bill. He appealed to the House whether they would allow Irish questions to be frittered away in the mode which was now attempted by those who supported the Amendment, which if carried could work nothing but the postponement, and, possibly, the entire defeat of this measure for the present Session.

THE O'CONOR DON: The noble Lord who has just sat down has taunted us on this side of the House with taking up five hours to no purpose. I do not know whether he is not himself open to a charge of complicity in this crime, for I confess I do not see the results of his speech. He tells us that the Resolution of my hon. Friend the Member for Galway is beside the question—that it is foreign to it—that this Bill is not at all the large measure we supposed it was meant to be—that it is a very simple Bill, dealing with one subject only, and that we were endeavouring to defeat it, not openly, in a manly way, but by a side-wind—by proposing a Resolution that has nothing to do with it. Our answer is simply this:—We believed from the Queen's Speech, from the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to his constituents last winter, and from other speeches and statements, that the Government did intend to deal in a large and comprehensive way with the land question of Ireland, and we believed further that this Bill was the answer to their promises; and believing all this, and believing that it fell short of everything that could be called a settlement, we demand to extend it, so as to embrace the question of tenure, without which there can be no settlement satisfactory to the people of Ireland. We do not want to oppose the second reading of this Bill; we desire only to render it more satisfactory. As it is, it is in no sense a settlement. But I pass on from this part of the noble Lord's speech. He told us that on this side of the House we knew nothing of this Bill; that we showed a gross ignorance of its details, and that, in fact, we evaded the question. Well, Sir, I will try and deal with the Bill, with the Bill only, and regarding it merely as a Bill for providing compensation to tenants for improvements, I would ask, what does it really accomplish? When the Bill was first introduced, and on a cursory view of it, I frankly confess I was much impressed in its favour. It seemed to me to contain not only valuable principles, but also to originate very simple machinery by which the improvement of the soil of Ireland might be pushed forward; but the more I examined the Bill the more I found these impressions illusory, and I was obliged, with regret, to come to the conclusion that whatever good might be effected by the Bill, would be more than counterbalanced by its evil tendency. I say I came to this conclusion with regret, for I thought that the noble Lord—having admitted certain principles undoubtedly contained in the Bill, having admitted the necessity for legislation, having, I believe, honestly and sincerely taken up the question with the intention of satisfactorily settling it—was in a position to do far more than could be done by any Minister on this side of the House. To give the noble Lord, then, every assistance in my power was my most earnest desire, and no party consideration could for a moment induce me to throw any difficulty in his way when endeavouring to settle a question which, I think, can be best settled by a Conservative Government. But what is it this Bill proposes to do? It proposes to give to the occupying tenants of the soil in Ireland, whether leaseholders or not, a means for obtaining security for the value of any improvements made in or on the land whilst in their occupation. It goes even further than this. Not only does it provide a legal method by which the tenant's interest in his improvements may be secured, but it actually proposes to furnish him with the means of making them ; for it proposes to lend public money to tenants, even to tenants-at-will in Ireland, for making certain classes of improvements set forth in one of the sections of the Bill. Well, in this appears at first sight, not only a treatment of the tenant with justice, but I would add, with the utmost generosity ; liberality could hardly go further. Yet, I venture to think that with respect to nine-tenths, perhaps ninety-nine-hundredths of the tenants of Ireland, this would be a dead letter. I take for granted that with respect to the holders of small farms of land, tenants from year to year, these provisions would be wholly inoperative. Any one who knows that class of tenantry in Ireland must well know they would never go through all the forms necessary for obtaining this advance of money, or for registering any improvement they might make. They would not understand how to do it, and as this advance of money would necessitate an annual payment of interest, or what would seem to them an increase of rent, they would never, of their own accord, undertake it. I believe they would be wrong in this. I know it would be a short-sighted policy, but it is quite idle to argue on it. Any one who has to deal with this class of tenantry, knows perfectly well that they would never with a bond fide intention take advantage of the Act. Nor, indeed, do I see that the landlord of such tenants would permit them to raise this money, and for this reason. If the landlord believed that the proposed improvement was desirable, and that it would be well to raise public money to execute it, he would, naturally, raise the money himself, have the whole control over its disbursement, and as he was to have the responsibility of its re-payment, would like to see that it was properly and beneficially expended. But supposing the landlord to have no objection to the tenant's raising the money and executing the improvement, and supposing the tenant to understand thoroughly the mode of procedure, and to have no foolish prejudice against paying a fair interest for the advance, yet I would ask what is the inducement placed before such a tenant to take advantage of the Act ? It is proposed, I believe, that money should be advanced re-payable in thirty-five years by means of an annuity of 5 per cent each year. Now, it must be quite evident that supposing the improved state of the soil lasted only thirty-five years, and that it equalled only 5 per cent per annum on the outlay, there would be no inducement either to the landlord or the tenant to raise the money or to make the improvement. The inducement held out to the owners of land in Ireland at present to raise money and improve their estates, is that the improvements last longer than the period during which the loan is repayable, and that they annually produce more than the annual sum required in re-payment of the loan. Under the present Land Improvement Acts, an annuity of  $6\frac{1}{2}$  per cent clears off principal and interest in twenty-two years ; and if the money be well laid out in draining or reclaiming, it ought to yield 10 per cent per annum, and its effects ought to last long after the twenty-two years expired. Here, then, is the inducement held out to landlords to take advantage of the present Land Improvement Acts ; but will tenants from year to year have the same incentive under the Bill of the noble Lord ? Undoubtedly they will not. They may raise this money, they may make these improvements, but when they are made the landlord may take possession of them either by turning out the tenant or by raising his rent in the full proportion of the difference between the increased value of the land, and the annual charge to the Government. There is no security whatever that the tenant will gain the slightest advantage from these improvements, and although, to be sure, he is secured against loss, yet that is not sufficient inducement to hold out to him. The position, then, of the tenant from year to year is simply this—he may either lay out his own money, or raise money through the Board of Works, for the purpose of improving his land, and by this Bill he is secured against being a loser, but no security is given that he will be a gainer. It may be said that it is a great point to secure such a man against loss, tenants from year to year at present lay out money even without being secured against loss, and surely a Bill which gives even this security is, so far, beneficial. Far be it from me, Sir, to deny any merits which the measure possesses. I admit that it possesses this, but when we recollect that notices of the proposed improvements must be served on the Board of Works ; that estimates must be made and examined ; that the landlord must be consulted ; that his attention will be drawn to the rent and to the change in it consequent on the charge for the money expended, I am sure no one who knows anything of the small farmers of Ireland will differ from me when I say that, so far as they are concerned, the Bill will have no effect. An individual tenant here and there may take advantage of it; but the instance will be very rare, and not at all such as would justify us in considering this a settlement of the land question. But how does it deal with regard to leaseholders? There is no doubt it holds out great advantages and inducements to improve, to the tenant. Indeed, the doubt in this case is whether it is fair to the landlord, for it allows the tenant to make certain improvements and to charge the landlord with their cost without the consent and even against the will of the landlord. Whether this is a fair or just principle I will not undertake to say. Of this I am sure, the landlords of Ireland would not consider it either one or the other, and they would take very good care not to subject themselves to its disadvantages. In Ireland, as I have said before, tenants under lease are rare exceptions. In the majority of cases land is set merely from year to year, and nearly all the complaints on the land question really have their origin in this want of any lengthened tenure. As I have said before, what I believe is really required is legislation which will promote the granting of tenure, and which will overcome this difficulty. But how will the present Bill work in this respect? It proposes to give great advantages to the leaseholders; it proposes to render them even more independent of their landlords than they are at present; it proposes to give them power to place a first charge on the landlord's fee-simple, without his concurrence, and even against his expressed wish. In one word, it proposes to hand over to the tenant leaseholders rights and powers which the bulk of the landlords of Ireland believe to be essentially theirs. Well, Sir, as I have said, we have at present very few leases in Ireland; but after the passing of this Bill, can we expect that a single new one will be granted? Is it to be expected that landlords will willingly, with their eyes open, thus put themselves in the power of their tenants? Not only does this Bill offer no inducement to leases, but it raises the strongest barrier to their being granted, and, in this respect, might justly be termed a Bill to prevent the extension of leases in Ireland. This is my strongest objection to it. Here, I believe it to be positively injurious, and its negative advantages are by no means a counterbalance for this evil. But, Sir, whilst this is my principal reason for opposing this part of the Bill, I must point out to the House that a principle more subversive than this is of all the rights of property, cannot be imagined. For the Bill in this respect is not only prospective, but retrospective. Landlords who made leases before the passing of this Act, without the slightest idea of its ever being proposed, will all of a sudden find themselves liable to charges which they could never have contemplated, over which they will have no control, and against which they can only uselessly protest. Can we imagine a more direct invasion of the rights of property than this? The noble Lord seems to me, indeed, to have a happy knack of embodying in his Bills principles utterly subversive of the rights he desires to maintain, and yet not permitting these principles to be carried out so as to be practically useful. Thus, in 1852, to a Bill of the most worthless character as regarded prospective improvements, he tacked on a retrospective clause practically worthless to the tenantry, yet subversive to the highest degree of the rights or privileges of the landlord. Now, Sir, I say, if we are to invade these rights or destroy these privileges, let us have something in return; let us have a measure which will reach not a few, but the great bulk of the people of the country—a measure not in the interest of mere isolated individuals, but for the benefit, the satisfaction, and the contentment of the nation. Sir, I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Londonderry, that if we had general prosperity in Ireland we should not require these land Bills. I agree with him that if we had manufactures general all over the country—if we had a brisk trade, a commerce, and other employment for the people besides employment on the land, we might dispense with these debates. I further agree with him that we have many natural elements for the establishment of such a state of things in Ireland, and I would ask him why such establishment has not taken place. The reason is, because the people are discontented, disaffected, rebellious—because security is not suffered to exist in Ireland, and because periodical outbreaks destroy all that confidence which is essential to commercial enterprise. And this state of insecurity will ever continue until you give the occupier of the soil in Ireland some security for himself — something which he values to defend—something to make him love the Constitution under which he lives. To get commercial prosperity therein we must first have the country quiet and contented, and without dealing with the tenure of land this is impossible. I promised not to detain the House long; I will keep that promise, and will now merely reiterate my firm conviction, that on the settlement of the land question depends the peace, prosperity, and contentment of Ireland.

MR. READ remarked that the great defects in the Bill introduced by the right hon. Member for Louth last Session were, as he pointed out at the time, that it laid down no scale for determining the rate of compensation; that it did not register the improvements when made; and that it provided no machinery for deciding whether the works were necessary or had been properly executed. Now, the present measure introduced a third party in the shape of a commissioner, an independent man, who would say whether the improvements had been well carried out, and would also, he supposed, by his inspectors, instruct the tenants how they were to be done. He would, moreover, have the power of advancing Government money at a very liberal rate of interest. The hon. Member for Maldon had taken great pains to prove the inconsistency of the noble Lord (Lord Naas) in proposing this Bill, he having been the author of a Resolution adopted by a Select Committee in 1865, and of an Amendment in opposition to the measure of the late Government. He thought, however, the apparent inconsistency might be reconciled. Any one acquainted with agriculture must be aware that the multiplication of buildings, the making of new farm roads, and the construction of additional fences, though they might be deemed improvements as far as regarded a particular plot of ground, would in all probability militate against the general consolidation and improvement of an estate, and ought not therefore to be undertaken without the consent of the landlord. Reclaiming a bog, cultivating a mountain side, draining, when properly executed, and removing projecting rocks and stones, could not, on the other hand, but be suitable improvements for any land, and the landlord who objected to these ought to keep the farm in his own hands. He still held the opinion which he expressed last year, that all purely agricultural improvements ought to be paid for in the course of at least twenty-one years, and if he had any fault to find with the present Bill it was for being too liberal, for he thought that instead of extending compensation over a period of thirty-five years, with the payment of 5 per cent, the term might be contracted to twenty-one years, with the usual payment of 6½ or 7 per cent. Irish Members had said a tenant would not make these improvements unless he expected a return of 10 or 15 per cent, so that no harm would be done by such a restriction of time. It seemed to him that very exaggerated notions prevailed as to the amount of tenant right existing in England. No tenant right existed in England, for example, like that of Ulster. In some parts of the country, as Cheshire, a certain allowance was by custom made to tenants for boning, draining, &c.; and there was the notable example of Lincolnshire, where improvements were paid for on a certain scale. But there was no fixity of tenure, and every man was liable to quit at six months' notice; yet there was no part of the kingdom better cultivated. A speech of the noble Earl at the head of the Government had been quoted, to the effect that if a tenant who had drained his land received notice to quit, he could sue his landlord for compensation. But in ninety-nine cases out of 100 a tenant in England had no such remedy. A tenant's covenant, were very different things. He made certain payments for hay, straw, manure, &c., on taking a farm, and he expected to be repaid for the same on leaving it. He should be sorry to be understood as saying anything in disparagement of leases. As a Norfolk man he was bound to say that, in his opinion, there was nothing so advantageous to agriculture. The landlord always secured more rent. He knew, also, when to advance his rent, and he could look forward to the permanent improvement of his property. The tenant on his part enjoyed a certain independence under a lease, and had a chance of reaping what he had sown, which encouraged him to make a larger expenditure of labour and capital upon his land. If he were a landlord, he should not object to grant leases to intelligent, enterprising, and prosperous tenants; but he should seriously object to grant leases where the tenants were poor and ignorant. He would rather by far allow the smaller tenantry to expend their own money under the Bill or to borrow of the Government than grant leases indiscriminately for twenty-one years. The suggestion that where no written agreement could be produced a lease of twenty-one years was to be assumed, was about as reasonable as to enact that if a man did not carry a certificate from a doctor to say he was sane he was to be held to be mad. Remarks having been made about the size of farms, he would express his belief that in England the largest estates were the best farmed, the lowest rented, and were let with the most liberal agreements in regard to cultivation. He believed Ireland was no exception to this rule. Large farms offered the fullest scope for the employment of capital and scientific appliances to agriculture. Small farms had their uses, for otherwise persons of small capital would have no opportunity of applying themselves to the cultivation of the soil, and the labourer would have no chance of bettering his condition by becoming a small farmer. He believed that if this Bill were passed, an immense stimulus would be given to the employment of labour, for where a large quantity of farms were in the hands of small occupiers, there was very little demand for agricultural labour, and wages were very low. If the Government would extend this Bill to England, he and the other tenantry of England would by no means consider it the act of effrontery described by the hon. Member for Tralee (The O'Donoghue). He would only add further that if the Irish tenantry were not content with this judicious recognition of their rights, there must be something of a social and political element in the question of granting leases in Ireland which he, as an English farmer, could not understand.

MR. KENNEDY said, he had only known one difficulty, which the Legislature of this country was not capable of overcoming. That difficulty was Ireland, and the responsibility was upon England and not Ireland. The fact was, English Members took very little interest in the subject; yet the peace and prosperity of Ireland were of equal importance with the question which had occupied so much attention during the present Session. The Irish Members were charged with the responsibility of what occurred in that country; but he threw back the responsibility of the present state of Ireland upon the British Government and upon British representatives, for it was the interference of English Members and their votes in Irish affairs that had placed that country in her present unfortunate position. If a calculation were made of the improvements effected by the tenants since the confiscation of the land of Ireland, it would, he believed, be found that more than the value of the fee-simple had been paid for by the tenants. He maintained that the responsibility for the present state of Ireland devolved, from first to last, upon England. ["Question!"] Surely, the question was whether they had governed Ireland as they ought to have done? The question that had now to be decided was whether the proposed legislation was suitable to Ireland? He gave the Chief Secretary every credit for his intentions, and for certain good portions of his measure, though they were of a limited character; and, without departing from its principle, he thought the Bill might be made a good one for tenants who had leases. But he must protest against the unprotected position in which it would place the tenant-at-will. England had tried many experiments with Ireland; but it had not tried the experiment of doing common justice on the land question. In only one of the four Provinces of Ireland was the principle of property recognised as regarded the tenant; while in the other three the principle of confiscation prevailed. They knew what the consequences of these two different systems were in Ulster on the one hand, and in Leinster, Munster, and Connaught on the other; and if they would profit by experience they would extend the custom established in Ulster to the rest of Ireland. They had to reconcile proprietary rights with the right of the people to exist.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. CHATTERTON) said, the Amendment which had that evening been moved seemed to him to have but very little connection with the subject-matter of the Bill which was under discussion. In dealing with that Bill he should not think it necessary to follow hon. Members opposite into a disquisition on the real or fancied grievances of Ireland. That was not the point on which the House was invited to pronounce a decision; nor was it called upon to effect a complete settlement of what was known as the landlord and tenant question in that country. He made that observation because the Amendment seemed to be founded on the supposition that the Government were introducing a measure which they regarded as affording a panacea for all the evils of which they had heard so much in the course of the debate. The Government, however, proposed to do no such thing. All they aimed at was to lay before the House for its acceptance a measure of a very practical and moderate character; and he hardly anticipated that when such a measure, calculated—as he believed very few would deny it was—eminently to benefit the agricultural population of Ireland, was introduced it would have been met, as it had been on the present occasion, not by a direct condemnation, but by a proposition, asking the House to take the preliminary step of pronouncing an opinion on the vexed question of the tenure of land in Ireland. Such a proposal he must characterize as altogether inopportune. What fate awaited any Bill dealing with that question must depend entirely upon its scope and nature; and the proper time to discuss such a Bill was when it was actually before the House. It was hardly to be expected, he thought, that Parliament would ever give its sanction to any measure making it compulsory on the landlord in Ireland to grant leases whether he wished or not. Few hon. Members, indeed, would be so rash as to advocate a proposal of that kind; and the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Gregory) himself had stated that he did not approve the giving leases to all tenants indiscriminately—adding that, according to his view, some selection should be made. But how, he (the Attorney General) would ask, was an Act of Parliament to make any such selection? The hon. Gentleman had also spoken of a gradual approximation and a change; but he failed to inform the House in what that change was to consist. Was he in favour of a compulsory granting of leases, or did he advocate the removal of the obstacles to granting them which stood in the way of those landlords who were willing that they should be given? So far as he could see, the Amendment of the hon. Member had but little or no bearing on the measure before the House, although it might have some connection with that which stood next on the paper—the Land Improvement and Leasing (Ireland) Bill. For his own part, he should never be a supporter of any proposal which had for its object the forcing on the landlord the granting of a lease. And was it, he would ask, fair to bring about by indirect means that which the House would not directly sanction? Was it right to provoke the landlord and to place restrictions on him to accomplish indirectly the purpose of allowing the tenant to remain on his farm and giving him what was by some called security, and by others fixity in his tenure? But the hon. Member for Galway was followed by the hon. Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Bryan), who dissented from the restricted sentiments which he had expressed, and who gave it as his opinion that leases should be scattered broadcast through the country. The hon. Member for Clonmel (Mr. Bagwell) went further still, and openly avowed himself to be an advocate for fixity of tenure—for he contended that so long as a tenant pays his rent and taxes no one should have the right to disturb him. Was the House prepared to adopt that view and to indorse the proposition that a tenant might under those circumstances always retain possession of his farm, no matter how turbulent or how bad he might otherwise be, or how much the landlord might require his land? The present Bill would, he maintained, give to the tenant, if fairly worked, the right to secure prospectively payment for his improvements on favourable terms; and if it were passed into a law, the promoters of that agitation on the subject which had done so much mischief in Ireland would find their vocation gone, or the whole of their demands must resolve themselves into the plain and naked proposal that the property in the land should be transferred from the landlord to the tenant. Against the principle of the Bill, he might add, he had not heard a single objection from the other side of the House. On his own side some such objection had been advanced; but he thought he should be able to show that that objection was not well founded; and that the Bill did not attempt to interfere in the slightest degree with the rights of property. What was the nature of the measure? It in the first instance provided for the tenants a fund to be lent to them by Government if they chose to borrow it, with a term of thirty-five years for its repayment in instalments, and at the rate of 5 per cent. Was ever money, he would ask, lent on more advantageous terms? A former Act gave power to landlords to apply to the Secretary of State, through the medium of a public board, for loans, giving guarantee for their repayment. By this Bill every tenant, whatever his rank, could borrow money from out of the public funds for the improvement of his holding, instead of drawing a line, as was done in the Act referred to by the hon. Gentleman, beneath which such applications could not be made. Further, if the tenant had money of his own which he was willing to spend on improvements, he would be able under this Act to have a right of charge upon the land to the same extent as if he had borrowed the money from the public funds. More than this, if the tenant had neither money of his own, nor was willing to borrow the money of the State, but desired to expend his own labour or the labour of his family on his holding, then that labour was to be computed for his benefit at a money value, and in virtue of it he would have a charge upon the land. Surely there could be nothing more beneficial to the tenant than this. But the rights of the landlord had been discovered in the course of the debate; indeed, the principal opposition to the Bill had been based upon the fancied invasion of those rights. Now, he fully admitted that the landlord was entitled to as much protection as the tenant. But it was a mistake to suppose that there was anything in the Bill calculated to imperil his just rights. In the first place, he was protected by the ample definition of the word that was contained in the Bill. In the next place, notice of any intended improvements must be given to the landlord and his consent was required; and further, this notice had to be communicated first of all to the Commissioner, whose duty it would be to transmit it to the landlord. By means of that notice the rights of the landlord were admirably preserved, and on that point the landlord could not take objection to the Bill. With regard to the nature of the improvements which might be effected under the Bill, it was said that great injustice was done to the landlords. Now, he would be the last person to interfere unfairly with the rights of landlords; but, at the same time, he asked the landlords to consider whether anything unfair was really proposed, and to recollect that in all these matters there must be concession both on one side and the other. The first class of improvements mentioned in the Bill were the thorough or main drainage of land, the reclaiming of bog land, or reclaiming or enclosing of waste land or clearing land of rocks or stones, and the removal of useless fences. These were improvements in the land, necessarily adding to its productive power. The second class of improvements were improvements upon the land as distinguished from improvements in the land, and these consisted of the making of fences, the making of farm roads, and the erection of buildings. Against these last three kinds of improvement the landlord would have an absolute veto without assigning any reason; but it was thought that the Bill, without infringing unfairly on the rights of property, might go so far as to declare that the landlord should not have an absolute veto against the execution of what were improvements in the land, and tended to increase its productive power. A responsible Commissioner was interposed as a kind of judicial officer to ascertain whether or not the three kinds of improvements in the land mentioned in the Bill should be made or not. The Commissioner was bound to hear both landlord and tenant; and if he thought that the improvements which the tenant had given notice of ought to be carried out, and was satisfied that the public money was sufficiently secured, he must decide on the matter, and the landlord was not to interpose an absolute veto. That did not appear to be an unreasonable or unfair arrangement as regarded the rights of the landlord; but if the House thought that such a provision ought not to be introduced it was a matter which did not go to the principle of the measure, and the Bill would still work well if the veto of the landlord were allowed in every case. It was scarcely conceivable that a landlord would be so blind to his own interest as to pass an absolute veto on that which would be an improvement to his own estate. If this was considered to be, as he admitted in some sense it was, an infringement on the rights of property, it was not in the slightest degree essential to the carrying or working of the measure, and they would be prepared to give it up if in Committee it should be considered a restriction that ought not to be retained. The fullest notice was to be given to the landlord in every case and the Commissioners were to see that the improvements were really carried out. Provision was also made for the maintenance of the improvements when made. If the tenant did not keep up the improvements he would be the party to suffer, for a deduction would be made from what he would otherwise have been entitled to. They were not proposing to make a loan of Government money to the tenant, but to the land; the land was to be the borrower, and the land was to bear the burden of payment, no matter who might be the tenant. He spoke with some confidence, then, when he said that this was a Bill that ought to receive a second reading. It was a good practical measure, considerate and beneficial towards the tenant, and not unduly interfering with the rights of the landlord. The Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Galway was not in any way germane to the subject-matter of the Bill. However important in itself, it was impolitic to make it a preliminary to the present discussion. He therefore trusted the Bill would be read a second time, and that they would be allowed to consider in Committee the details best calculated to carry out the object which they all had in view—facilitating improvement by the tenant while preserving the rights of the landlord.

MR. SERJEANT SULLIVAN said, that the right hon. and learned Gentleman had told the House at the commencement of his observations that this Bill was never intended to settle the land question, and that those who regarded it as a settlement of the land question were under a great mistake. Why, then, did Government bring forward as a great question like this a measure which was not intended to settle it? He should have expected that the Government in bringing forward a Bill would have stated that in their opinion it would settle the question. If they flung on the table a Bill not intending to settle it they were dealing with the question in an illusory manner. He must say he thought the question had been approached in a most narrow and niggardly spirit. When his right hon. and learned Friend said the Amendment was not germane to the question, he only established what on a former occasion he took credit for having said that he did not understand the main question. The questions of compensation and tenure were intimately connected, and one would not be settled without the other; and a fairer principle for adjusting that settlement could never be laid down than that of the tenant being allowed to remain in possession until he obtained compensation by that possession for the value of what he had laid out. The question was not whether the noble Lord had changed his opinion. Perhaps he had been too rudely assailed by the hon. Member for Maldon (Mr. Sandford). He thought the noble Lord had acted very much on his former convictions in bringing in so niggard a Bill as this. The question before the House was not whether the present Bill, or the Bill of the late Government was the best measure. What the people of Ireland required was a good measure; and the question was whether this Bill, which excluded the question of tenure, could be considered satisfactory. He thought the Amendment, which declared that no measure could be satisfactory which did not give the encouragement of leases, was as mild a proposition as could be brought forward. The right hon. and learned Gentleman took credit to himself and the Government for having for the first time proposed to enable tenants to obtain public money for the purpose of improvements. Hitherto, he said, only owners of land were able to get advances for improvements. But this was an error. By the Act of 1847 tenants who had an unexpired lease for twenty-five years might obtain money for the purpose of improvement on certain conditions; but so complicated were the conditions and the machinery that the Act had become a dead letter, and so he believed would the present measure. That Act, by the Act of Victoria, was extended to buildings and farm dwellings. But how many applications had been made under the 7th section? He believed it had never been acted upon at all, for the clause provided that no loan should be granted until security was given to the satisfaction of the Commissioners. In the case of a tenant from year to year, if he made a bad improvement the charge would fall upon the land; and if it turned out to be a good improvement, he might be served with a notice to quit. For a measure of this kind to be properly framed the landlord must give up some of his rights in order that his land may be improved. The Bill of last Session would have been of the greatest advantage to the landlords, because it was only in cases where the expenditure by the tenant had improved the rateable value of the land that compensation was to be made by the landlord in case he evicted the tenant. The Bill could not in any respect be considered as anything even approaching to a settlement of the question; and he regretted that the moderate Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Galway should have been met with so strong an opposition.

MR. GRAVES moved the adjournment of the Debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
(Mr. Graves.)

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE hoped that the noble Lord opposite would not assent to the adjournment of the debate. They had had a very long debate upon the Resolution moved by the hon. Member for Galway—a Resolution which, in his opinion, was entirely germane to the subject before the House. The question had been thoroughly investigated, and hon. Members on that side of the House were anxious to come to a vote upon it that night. If any hon. Gentleman was desirous of speaking upon the Bill, he would have full opportunity of doing so.

MR. GRAVES said he had moved the adjournment of the debate because the question was one of great importance, and ought not to be discussed after midnight. Besides, there were several Amendments on it to be debated.

LORD HENRY THYNNE hoped the House would not consent to the adjournment of the debate. After the statement made last year by the noble Lord the Member for Cockermouth, he did not think that the present Bill could hold water.

LORD NAAS: I can only say that it is the intention of the Government to go on with this Bill, and to endeavour to ascertain at the earliest possible moment the opinion of the House upon it. Had it been the desire of many hon. Members to address the House upon the question, I should certainly have been prepared to support the Motion of the hon. Member for Liverpool for the adjournment of the debate; but as there appears to be a general opinion that the division should be taken to-night upon this question, I do not see how I can consent to that Motion. And now, as to the course I propose to take with regard to the Motion of the hon. Member for Galway. I do not understand that that Motion is intended to upset and to destroy the Bill; but I think that it is a very great mistake on the part of the House to mix up these two questions together. The Bill I have proposed deals solely and entirely with the question of compensation to the tenant, and I believe that if it passes into law it will be of the greatest possible advantage to the country, and that it will go a long way towards settling the tenant question; although, perhaps, not in the sense in which many hon. Gentlemen who have spoken to-night would wish, seeing that it will not in any way give fixity of tenure or long leases under legislative sanction to the tenant. Still, in my opinion, it will prove most beneficial to the industrious tenant and a great boon to the Irish tenantry. It would be impossible at this hour of the night (a quarter past twelve o'clock) to go fully into the principle of the Bill; but I may say that I shall oppose the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Galway, because I believe that it proposes to mix up two subjects which are essentially distinct. Still, if the House should think otherwise, I shall not regard their decision as a ground for abandoning the Bill. On the contrary, I shall then be glad to see how my hon. Friend proposes to carry out his project, and to see the nature of the clauses which he will doubtless bring forward to give effect to his Motion, which, if carried, I shall esteem simply in the light of an Instruction to the Committee. My own opinion is that these two subjects should be dealt with separately, and in opposing the Motion of my hon. Friend, I only do so for the purpose of proving that in my opinion it is not for the advancement of this question that the two subjects should be joined together. I will only repeat that I shall be curious to see the clauses which my hon. Friend proposes to add to the Bill, and can only hope that they may be such as will commend themselves to the majority of the House.

MR. NEWDEGATE supported the Motion for Adjournment, considering that the proper time for moving the Resolution was in Committee, and not on the second reading of the Bill.

MR. CONOLLY apprehended that according to the forms of the House the Speaker would have put the Question, "That the words proposed to be left out should stand part of the Question," and that if that had been decided in the negative the Bill of the noble Lord would have been lost. He thought this Bill intrinsically bad, and he believed a large party in the House thought so too; and he thought that the decision ought to be taken "Aye" or "No" on the second reading.

MR. GREGORY said, that his Amendment simply advocated the encouragement of leases, and did not mention anything about fixity of tenure or the establishment of long leases. He declined to bring up any clauses as suggested by the noble Lord, reserving that honour until he sat upon the Bench occupied by the noble Lord and his Colleagues.

SIR RAINALD KNIGHTLEY was anxious to support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Maldon (Mr. Sandford), and desired to learn from the Speaker how he was to vote in order to give effect to his intention. Was he to vote "Aye" or "No?"

MR. SPEAKER: I believe that the hon. Baronet might have ascertained from the hon. Member for Maldon, who sits at his side, what course he should pursue. The first Question that I shall have to put is "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," If that is decided by a majority of the "Ayes," the Question "That this Bill be now read a second time" will stand. If it is negatived, then will come the Question what words shall be supplied, and it will then be open to the hon. Member for Maldon to propose the Amendment which he has placed on the paper.

MR. GRAVES said, he would withdraw his Motion for the Adjournment.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and negatived.

Question proposed,

"That the words 'without prejudging the Second Reading of this Bill, this House is of opinion that no enactment for the settlement of the Landlord and Tenant question in Ireland can be deemed satisfactory which does not provide for the encouragement of leases in that Country,' be there added."

MR. SANDFORD moved that all the words after "opinion" be left out, in order to insert the words—

"No property should be charged with the repayment of loans advanced for the purpose of making improvements except such improvements be made with the consent of the landlord."

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, by leaving out all the words after the word "opinion," in order to add the words,

—instead thereof.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the said proposed Amendment."

The House divided :—Ayes 104; Noes 108: Majority 4.

Question proposed,

"That the words 'no property should be charged with the repayment of loans advanced for the purpose of making improvements except such improvements be made with the consent of the landlord' be there added."

LORD NAAS said, the Question then before the House was totally different from what had been under discussion during the whole evening. For himself he objected to both Amendments. He had been charged with inconsistency in respect of the course he had pursued last year, and this with reference to this question. The principle contained in his Motion of last year was perfectly sound, as contrasted with the Bill of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Chichester Fortescue); but the Government were of opinion that such a slight deviation from the principle laid down last year as was proposed by the present Bill might with propriety be acceded to. The difference between the two descriptions of improvement was this :—The Government believed that everything which was done on the land ought to be done only in conformity with the consent of the landlord; because considerable differences of opinion might arise between the landlord and the tenant as to the beneficial effect of such improvements. Everything, on the contrary, that was done in the soil could occasion no similar differences of opinion, and therefore, as no injury to the landlord could arise, the Government thought they were safe in permitting such improvements to be made without absolutely requiring his consent. It must be borne in mind that in every case notice of these improvements must be given to the landlord, who would have the opportunity before the Commissioner of consulting with his tenant, and if he could show that the proposed improvements would be otherwise than beneficial to the soil, or would be such as would not add a proportionate amount of value to the soil, then, beyond all question, it would be in his power to prevent the improvements from being made. If it were possible that injury could result to the landlord, then he admitted that the principle of the Bill would be a bad one; but being framed so as to bring about an amicable consultation between the landlord and tenant before any improvements were made, he believed that it would tend greatly to facilitate tenants anxious to improve bond fide in coming forward for that purpose. The whole object of the Bill was to endeavour to get landlords and tenants to combine for the purpose of effecting these improvements, and, as framed, he believed that it was eminently conducive to this object. As to saying that under this Bill improvements could be made that would be otherwise than beneficial to landlords, he maintained that it was a perfect absurdity. He believed that not a single landlord in Ireland, which unless he were a lunatic or an idiot, would attempt to object to the class of improvements proposed by this Bill. The House, therefore, would do well, in his opinion, to go into Committee on the Bill and consider its details, for in such matters the really important points were questions of detail. Whether the absolute consent of the landlord were insisted upon or struck out of the Bill, in practice he believed that it would make little difference; but as one course was less restrictive than the other he should vote against the Motion of the hon. Member for Maldon.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that at that time of night, he would not give any detailed reasons for the opinion which he entertained that his noble Friend had failed altogether to vindicate his own consistency in introducing a Bill this Session, the principle of which directly contradicted his Motion of last year, and the Resolution which he had proposed in the Select Committee only two years ago. The Bill now before the House involved a more serious and vital departure from the ordinary principles of legislation than anything contained in the Bill of the late Government, and yet was not calculated to attain for the mass of the people any one of those benefits which could alone justify such a departure. His hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. Gregory), and those who supported him, had reason to complain of the way in which the Government had manipulated the divisions. The result of those somewhat complicated manœuvres, which, till a few moments ago, he confessed he did not thoroughly understand, was that it had been made impossible for the House to pronounce any opinion upon the Resolution of the Member for Galway. The Government, consequently, would succeed in getting rid both of the Motion of the hon. Member for Maldon and of the original Resolution, which, if properly submitted to the House, would have been carried by a large majority.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the right hon. Gentleman gave Her Majesty's Government credit for an amount of dexterity to which they could fairly lay no claim. What had happened was the result of good fortune, not of any arrangement on their part. He must complain, however, that the House having spent the evening in discussing a particular question was now about to be hurried into a division on the Bill itself, the general merits of which had never been discussed. Merely uttering his individual opinion, he thought the debate had better be adjourned.

MR. FITZWILLIAM DICK moved the adjournment of the House.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the effect of rejecting the Motion of the hon. Member for Maldon would be to affirm that improvements in Ireland, unlike England, should be made without the consent of the landlord. That would be a novel and startling proposition. He accordingly supported the Motion for Adjournment.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE believed that, according to the forms of the House, the Bill could not be read a second time that evening, but hoped the Motion of the hon. Member for Maldon would be at once disposed of.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Dick.)

The House divided:—Ayes 115; Noes 97: Majority 18.

TRAMWAYS (IRELAND) ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. MONSELL, Bill to amend "The Tramways (Ireland) Act, 1860," and "The Tramways (Ireland) Amendment Act, 1861," ordered to be brought in by Mr. MONSELL and Mr. SHERIFF.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 125.]

PUBLIC WORKS COMMISSIONERS.

QUESTION.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Why the Report of the Public Works Commissioners for the last year has not been laid upon the table of the House?

Mr. HUNT replied, that the accounts which were embodied in the Report of the Commissioners were now made up to the end of the financial year, and it was obviously impossible that the Report could be laid on the table so early as the present moment; but he hoped it would be ready in the course of a few days.

IRISH AND SCOTCH REFORM BILLS. QUESTIONS.

Mr. STACPOOLE said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, When the Irish Reform Bill will be introduced?

[Sir ROBERT ANSTRUTHER had placed upon the paper a similar question with regard to the Scotch Reform Bill, and Mr. OLIPHANT also had given notice of his intention to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, there being no compound-householders in Scotland, he proposed in the Scotch Reform Bill to give the franchise to every ratepaying householder in Scotch burghs?]

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I will answer the Question of the hon. Member (Mr. Stacpoole) with great pleasure, and I will, at the same time, take this opportunity of answering the two other Questions bearing upon this matter which stand on the Paper. We think that the Scotch Reform Bill is rather more pressing than the Irish, seeing that there was an Irish Reform Bill passed at a comparatively recent date. I may, however, say that the Irish Reform Bill is in preparation. With regard to the Scotch Reform Bill, I hope very soon to produce it; but it is necessary before I do so that some progress should be made with the English Reform Bill. With regard to the Question of another hon. Gentleman (Mr. Oliphant), which comes next upon the Paper, I think it would be more convenient that the provisions of the Scotch Bill should be known when I make the general statement, rather than I should answer interrogatories of this kind with reference to some single provisions. I am quite aware that there are no compound-householders in Scotland; but I scarcely think that Scotland is a country that ought to be condoled with on account of that circumstance.

NEUTRALITY OF LUXEMBOURG. QUESTION.

Mr. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any suggestion that this country should enter into any guarantee for securing the future political neutrality of Luxembourg has been made to, or entertained by, Her Majesty's Government during the late Communications on the subject?

LORD STANLEY: Sir, a great many communications, practicable and impracticable, wise and foolish, have been addressed to me by various persons upon the subject of Luxembourg in the course of the last few weeks; but all arrangements which will regulate the political future of that State must be made in the Conference. And I may now say that I have every reason to hope that Conference will meet at a very early date. I do not think it would be my duty to anticipate what will be there discussed; but I think my hon. Friend has forgotten one fact of which he is, of course, aware—namely, that during the last twenty-eight years, since the Treaty of 1839, Luxembourg has been under a European guarantee, to which England is one of the parties. It is in the character of signatory to the Treaty of 1839 that we are now invited to discuss the future arrangements connected with Luxembourg.

IRELAND—ANTICIPATED DISTRESS IN GALWAY.—QUESTION.

Mr. GREGORY said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether any Report has reached him as to the probability of serious distress in the western part of Galway during the summer; and whether he has ordered any inquiry on this subject?

LORD NAAS said, in reply, that the only information which had reached him on the subject had been received from a gentleman of considerable importance in the district referred to. He had referred that letter to the Poor Law Commissioners, who would immediately institute an inquiry into the accuracy of the statements it contained.

IRELAND—COURT OF EXCHEQUER. QUESTION.

LORD DUNKELLIN said, he wished to ask Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether, with regard to the vacant Mastership of the Court of Exchequer, it be intended to adopt the recommendation of the Royal Commission on the Courts of Common Law and Equity, who in their Second Report stated that one Master was sufficient for the three Law Courts?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. CHATTERTON) said, in reply, that the subject was under the consideration of the Government, but no definite conclusion had been finally arrived at; he hoped, however, in a short time to be better prepared to answer the question.

NATIONAL DEBT BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, What day he proposes to bring on this Bill, as it would be utterly impossible that the discussion upon the Amendment he (Mr. H. B. Sheridan) had proposed upon that Bill with reference to the further reduction of Fire Insurance Duty could take place on Thursday next?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I think, Sir, it would be impossible to take this Bill on Thursday. I wish to bring it forward as early as possible, and I will endeavour to give as ample notice as I can, and, indeed, private notice to the hon. Gentleman.

FACTORY BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. BRIGHT: Sir, last night I made a suggestion to the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the absence of the Home Secretary with regard to referring the Factory Bill to a Select Committee. I now see the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole) in his place, so perhaps he will state what determination has been arrived at on the subject. I understood that probably the Government would be willing to consent to adopt that course, and if they did so I think it would be satisfactory to all concerned?

MR. WALPOLE: On Thursday I will state what course I intend to pursue in connection with this matter. Probably I shall go into Committee pro forma in order to insert certain Amendments, but by Thursday I shall be able to definitely state what I propose to do.

ARMY—PURCHASE OF COMMISSIONS. RESOLUTION.

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, in rising to bring before the notice of the House the question of purchase in the army, I cannot but be conscious that those Gentlemen who were Members of the last

Parliament must draw in their own minds a very unfavourable comparison between myself and that most distinguished and popular officer to whom this question used as of right to belong. Sir De Lacy Evans was then approaching the close of an exceptionally brilliant and prolonged military service, while his unworthy successor is at the commencement of a sufficiently obscure civil career. But, Sir, the most necessary qualification for any one who aspires to enlist in this crusade against purchase is that he should be young, because the service partakes of the nature of a forlorn hope which promises to last many years. Any one who has passed middle life must be a very sanguine man if he looks forward to seeing the promotion in the English Army administered on a mixed system of selection and seniority. It is true, indeed, that the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley) in the Session of 1862 closed a most able protest against the purchase system with these words—

I can only hope, in my case for my own sake, in his for the sake of his country, that both myself and the noble Lord will live to see that wished-for result. Army purchase has already survived many of its earliest, ablest, and most zealous opponents. It has seen out Lord Clyde, who was one of its most uncompromising enemies. It has seen out, I fear, the public life of Sir De Lacy Evans.

Sir, there is no subject which at present occupies the public imagination more strongly than the question of national defence. Few Gentlemen, on whichever side of the House they may sit, will deny that in the present alarming condition of the Continent, we, like others, should be prepared for the worst; and that we should aim at providing ourselves with such a fighting equipment, both by land and sea, as will discourage attack, and give a sense of security and independence. Hon. Gentlemen opposite hold that opinion in obedience to what I may describe, in no carping spirit, as the traditional instinct of their party. We, on this side, have been taught by experience that in military organization efficiency is only another name for the truest economy.

Now, Sir, in our defensive arrangements, the main point is the efficiency of our regular army. Whatever our reserves may be, the regular army must be, in technical parlance, our first line of battle. On whatever plan our army of reserve may be constituted, its training school and source of supply, both for officers and men, must be the standing army. But that army is constituted on a principle upon which no army was ever before constituted. The primary and indispensable qualification is not professional knowledge, or long and good service, or superior ability, but money. This principle is admitted, even by the warmest advocates of the present system, to be indefensible in theory. They all agree that if the army had to be constituted for the first time, they should not think of resting it upon such a foundation. My object will be to show that the system is also indefensible in practice—so indefensible as to make it essential to our safety that the army should now be reconstituted on a different principle.

For, in the first place, Sir, the army cannot be in any real sense of the word a profession while the purchase system exists. The meaning of a profession is that a man should be able to live by the occupation which he professes; and should look forward to prosper by devoting his best exertions to it. But officers have to pay for the privilege of belonging to the army; and, except under very extraordinary circumstances, they can hope for promotion only by making further payments. As a rule, the interest and life insurance on the sums invested equals, and sometimes greatly exceeds, the officers' pay. As a necessary consequence, the class of young men who depend for success upon their education and exertions, and who are the life and soul of every other profession, are to a great degree excluded from the army. Without a large supply of such men it is idle to talk of army reform. If, on the other hand, we succeeded in obtaining them in sufficient quantity, the army would very soon reform itself.

Again, Sir, if we look to the young men whom we get, we shall find that the most is not made of them under the present system. Parents cannot be expected both to give their sons an expensive education and at the same time to pay large sums of money for their commissions. The purchase system ought to have been abolished at the period when officers were required to pass professional examinations. As it is, the professional principle carries on an unequal and discouraging struggle against the money principle. Young men are taken from school before they have half finished their education, and are placed under a crammer to enable them to pass the superficial examination which precedes the first commission. How unfit and uninstructed they are, and how necessary it is for the public interests that a portion of the sums paid for commissions should be expended in completing the general and professional education of the young men intended for the army may be seen from the evidence of the distinguished officers examined before the Purchase Commission of 1857. I should beg to refer the House especially to the evidence of Major-General Lord West and Major-General Sir Thomas Franks. Lord West says—

“When I was commanding a regiment before Sebastopol, from sickness and casualties, the number of duty officers became very small, and I then urgently requested that some young officers who were kicking their heels at the depot might be sent out to head quarters forthwith. I received ten of these young officers in a batch, who did not know their right hand from their left, and had never been drilled. I was obliged to send them to the trenches in command of parties of thirty or forty men, much as I objected to have such parties under the command of such very young subalterns. All that I could do with those officers was this: I sent the adjutant on parade, and told him to show them how to march their men off the ground. All that I could say to them was, ‘If the enemy comes on, hold your ground, and drive them back if you can!’ In such case much was left to the steadiness of the non-commissioned officers and old soldiers.”

Lord West was asked—

“In point of fact, those young officers had no more knowledge of professional duties than if they had been so many civilians?”

And he answered, “Not a bit more.”

But, Sir, if young officers enter the army raw and untrained, when they are there the purchase system does not provide them with a sufficient inducement to study their profession. For, in the first place, it is not in human nature that men who have bought appointments should be, as a class, equally zealous public servants with men who have received those appointments upon grounds of merit, or even private interest. The chances are that a young clergyman whose father has purchased him the reversion of a living is not so earnest and industrious as one whom his Bishop has noticed and promoted. And to take an instance nearer home, I am told that before the Reform Bill of 1832 there existed a custom of buying a seat in Parliament; and that a Member who had paid for his borough at the rate of £1,000 a year, or £4,000 between two dissolutions, was not so regular an attendant at the House as one who was the chosen servant of a large popular constituency. In the same way a young officer cannot but feel that when he has paid to some quarter or another, it matters little what, a sum for which his pay, after stoppages have been deducted, is barely the legitimate interest, he has not so much obtained a situation as made an investment, and in many cases an uncommonly bad one. He has bought his commission. It is his. May he not do what he likes with his own? This idea is so deeply rooted in the army that I have actually heard ensigns defend the system on the ground that the pay was good interest for their capital. It never seemed to have crossed their minds that their services deserved any remuneration.

I appeal, Sir, to the personal experience of hon. Members. What are the objects to which the attention of young officers is chiefly directed after they have obtained their first commissions? Is it, as in other professions, to qualify themselves for early promotion by study, and careful attention to their duties? When they talk of promotion, has it the slightest reference to such old-fashioned conditions as these? Does not their conversation rather turn upon the opportunities for purchase which their own and other regiments afford; upon exchange; upon giving or receiving the difference between full and half-pay; upon the objectionable qualities of the officer who stops promotion by refusing to give more than the regulation price, and upon the amount which the officer who is ready to retire would be willing to take? All this haggling and huxtering, though dignified by the name of treaties and negotiations, is perfectly scandalous when the article chaffered for is the command of men with all the power for good or evil which military rule confers. Demoralizing in its very nature, this system of barter is doubly demoralizing when we reflect that it is illicit and clandestine. "We have it," says Sir De Lacy Evans,

"On the candid and honourable evidence of one of the partners of a most eminent army agency firm that, in several corps, but especially in the cavalry, double the legal prices, and often more than double, were usually given; and it appeared in the evidence of the Commander-in-Chief that officers who asked permission to make those purchases invariably concealed from the authorities their intention of violating the law."

Mr. Trevelyan

Now, Sir, on this point the evidence of the Commander-in-Chief is frank enough. He says—

"We never know anything about the excess on the regulation price. It is done unknown to us. I am afraid it is done. I admit that I have reason to know that it is done; but quite unofficially. I positively know nothing about it; but, of course, I have been long enough in the service to know that such things are done, and I am sorry that they are done."

Now, Sir, what a school is this in which our young men are to learn the high notions of honour which become an English officer and gentleman. In this respect, if in no other, our military education seems to be founded on the Spartan model; and our youth are to be, in accordance with the laws of Lycurgus, permitted to carry on a questionable traffic if only they can contrive to escape detection. If the purchase system is not to be abolished, at any rate, in the interests of public morality, it is high time that it should be legalized.

Sir, it will hardly be denied that the first condition of professional efficiency is adequate professional remuneration. Now the professional remuneration of an ensign is nominally 5s. 3d. a day; and out of this he is liable to an annual charge of twelve days' pay for band subscription, besides a contribution of twenty days' pay on first appointment, and twenty days' difference of pay on each promotion. What remains of his pittance barely suffices for his mess expenses even in the most moderate regiments. Now, the rate of pay ought to be such as to enable a young man from his very first entrance into our army to live frugally according to the habits of the day. Any rate short of this forms an almost insuperable bar to the best class of candidates. But when the well-wishers of the English officer propose to augment his miserably insufficient stipend, they are met by the Treasury with the answer that such augmentation would only increase the price of commissions, and would therefore fail to improve the condition of men whose pecuniary embarrassment results from the fact that they have already sunk in their commissions large sums, the interest on which is a heavy burden on their slender purses. These facts tell in the infantry; but they tell with double force in the cavalry. In the year 1859 the competition of rich men had run up the price of commissions in that branch of the service to such an extravagant height, and the luxurious habits imported by these men had so increased the expenses of living, that the system broke down of a sudden. There was a financial crash in the English army. Incredible as it may appear, our officers had over-specified and over-traded in commissions to such an extent that a panic took place, and no one could be found to buy. Sixty-five cornetries were going a begging for purchasers. To quote the words of Lord Herbert "the vacancies equalled in number the cornetries of eight regiments." It is to be hoped for the national credit that we contrived to conceal from the military men of foreign nations the fact that we could not get enough millionaires to officer our cavalry. So that we found ourselves in this absurd position: that, on the one hand, we could not get together enough poor men to recruit the ranks of our soldiers, and, on the other, we could not get enough rich men to recruit the ranks of our officers. The system broke down at both ends. In order to correct this evil the Commander-in-Chief proposed to reduce the stoppage for forage. This did not appear, in the eyes of Lord Herbert, fully to meet the difficulty. I quote his words once more—

"No man would consider that the reduction of 1s. 5d. per day would bring within his reach a mode of life which requires an outlay in hard money of sums rising from £840 to £7,000 or £10,000 (sometimes even more), with horses, uniform and accoutrements of an expensive character; and, above all, a style of living requiring a high allowance from his family, with the prospect of a good deal of debt at the end of it."

The difficulty was met in a much more effectual manner, a manner which in itself is a sufficient condemnation of the purchase system. Sir, the Secretary of State himself entered the commission market, and undertook a system of brokerage on a grand scale through the medium of the army reserve fund, which was justly described by Sir De Lacy Evans as a fund for the extension of the purchase system. Owing to the large number of commissions given and promotions made without purchase during the Crimean War, an unusually large proportion of commissions were held by officers who had not purchased them. When any of these officers wished to retire the Secretary of State authorized him to sell, and to receive out of the amount realized at the rate of £100 for every year's service, the remainder being paid to the reserve fund. The officers who purchased these commissions were of course at liberty to sell them in the usual way, and therefore every one of these commissions was subtracted from the rewards of long and good service, and added to the already too large domain of the purchase system. The sums obtained from the Infantry officers by this machinery were expended in extinguishing purchase in the yeomanry of the guard, in assisting the promotion of cavalry officers, and in other laudable objects. But laudable though those objects were, they ought not to have been promoted at the cost of the hardest worked and most under-paid portion of the army. These strange practices excited the honest indignation of the right hon. and gallant Member for Huntingdon (General Peel), who entered an able protest against them in the form of a Question. Sir, I appeal to that right hon. and gallant Member, and I hope he will not consider that appeal impertinent, to show why these practices which he so justly disapproves are not the certain and inevitable result of the purchase system; a system which is fast eating away all the prizes which remain to excite the honourable ambition and emulation of our military men.

Sir, it is worthy of being remarked that the system of buying and selling appointments has not always been confined to the army. In almost every other department of the public service that system has been tried and found wanting. It still exists to a certain extent in the Church; which in this respect appears anxious, by a sinister similarity to the army, to keep up its character as Church militant. In old days there was always a bargain between the incoming and outgoing tenant of a public situation. In 1660 Samuel Pepys obtained the appointment of Clerk of the Acts, and immediately received for the office a bid of £500. So legitimate did this transaction appear to him that he, with his customary piety, "prayed to God to direct me in what I do herein." Presently a former holder of the office turns up in the person of Mr. Barlow—

"An old consumptive man, and fair conditioned. After much talk I did grant him what he asked—namely, £50 per annum if my salary be not increased; and £100 per annum in case it be £350."

A fortnight after he gets an offer of £1,000, "which made my mouth water." This practice prevailed in all the Departments of State throughout the bad times of the Restoration. With the Revolution a healthier state of public morality began to prevail. But this deleterious system, banished from the Admiralty, the Law Courts, and the great Civil Departments of the State, found a home and a stronghold in the army. And now, Sir, I ask—Why is this so?

We are told—and here I come to one of the favourite arguments adduced by the advocates of purchase—that it is necessary that the army should be officered by English gentlemen, and that the best test of the qualities of a gentleman is the possession of wealth. Sir, why should not the army under any circumstances get its full share of English gentlemen? The navy does not complain that it cannot attract gentlemen in sufficient numbers; nor the Church; nor India; nor the permanent Civil Service. In what is the army inferior to any of these. Is it a discreditable profession? It is of all professions the most honourable. Is it an unpopular profession? So far from that, military distinction is the surest title to the love and admiration of the English people. We must not imagine that if purchase were abolished it would be difficult to induce high-spirited young Englishmen to wear a red coat. I do not think so meanly of my own friends and contemporaries as to believe that they are tempted to enter the army by the privilege of living with rich men and buying their steps. These are not the charms of a military career. The attractions which bring the youth of our upper classes into the army is the cheerful, out-of-door, adventurous life; the pleasant brotherhood of the mess; the hope of early fame; the desire to serve their country in a strait. Sir, there are plenty of these men within our own walls. One county alone has the honour of sending hither two "V.C.'s." I make bold to say that, even if there had not been commissions to be bought or sold, those honourable Members would have been bound wherever "V.C.'s" were to be earned.

And it is worth the while of those who hold it to be of importance that men of substance should form the bulk of our officers, to turn to the evidence which Lord Clyde gave before the Purchase Commission of 1857. That distinguished officer was of opinion that the best and least invidious test of sufficiency of wealth was a high standard of education. He says—

"I presume that the parents and relatives, who would take care to fit a youth to pass the standard which I conceive would be necessary, would have imposed on them the necessity of keeping him at school at least till the age of seventeen or eighteen. But that implies, in my idea, the possession of property. The very fact of the relations of a boy being able to maintain him at college till eighteen would ally him with property; and I think if you established a high standard of examination you would then improve the officers of the army."

And these are not the remarks of a book-worm, or of a doctrinaire, one of that class of men of whom we used to be so much afraid during the cattle plague debates, and whom it was then the custom to stigmatise by the name of "philosopher." These are the sentiments of a General whose capacity for the management of an army in the field was often tried, and never found wanting.

Sir, there may be some hon. Members present to whom this question is not familiar, and who, knowing that a Commission has sat upon the purchase system, may be inclined to take their opinion from the Report of that Commission. Now, Sir, the recommendation of that Commission, and the fate which that recommendation met with, form an instructive chapter in our history of military administration. For the Commission found that the post of lieutenant-colonel is of the greatest importance for the efficiency of the regiment, and is attainable by purchase. And they recommended that—

"The Lieutenant Colonelcy should no longer be purchasable, but should be an appointment made by the selection of the Commander-in-Chief from all the Majors in that branch of the service."

It is hard to find a reason for dissenting from this recommendation. All who know the British army, Sir, could probably mention, even within the narrow circle of their own experience, officers who have purchased this great charge who never could have attained to it under any system of promotion into which the principle of selection entered even to the most modified extent. It has happened before now that the existence of a regiment or the prestige of the nation has been in the hands of men whom none of their acquaintances would trust with the arrangements of a picnic or shooting party. Within the last six months, especially, the instance has occurred of a man who was admitted by all who knew him to be well meaning, and even to have been actively benevolent in the private sphere which alone was suited to him. His ill luck brought him to the front at a great crisis. His head was turned, and he performed actions, wrote despatches so foolish and ill-judged, that his brother officers hastened to clear the credit of the service by assuring their friends that the writer was known throughout the army to be a man of weak and inferior ability; and yet this fact, though long notorious, had not prevented him from being promoted to the command of his battalion. Now, Sir, as there was great delay in giving effect to the recommendations of the Commission, Sir De Lacy Evans moved in March, 1860, a Resolution in this House to the effect—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to order the gradual abolition, as soon as practicable, of the Sale and Purchase of Commissions in the Army (having due regard to existing rights)—with the view of substituting for the Purchase System, promotion, partly by seniority and partly by selection, grounded on War services of merit, length of Colonial and Home services, and attested professional fitness—under such regulations as Her Majesty shall be pleased to direct.”—[3 Hansard, clvii. 20.]

A warm debate ensued, in the course of which Lord Herbert, then Secretary of State for War, stated that he was prepared to carry out the recommendation of the Commission. To quote his precise words—

“For my own part, I think that purchase ought to be limited to the ranks of the service below that of a lieutenant-colonel, in which position I think that due care ought to be taken that an incompetent man, to whose charge the lives of 1,000 men are to be committed, should not be placed. Without pledging myself to details, because many points will require very careful consideration, I may state that the principle laid down by the Commission is the principle the Government acknowledges in dealing with this question. It will be my duty to prepare a scheme, founded on that principle, with the greatest care, thought, and caution, and lay it before the military authorities for consideration.”

Still there seemed to be difficulties in giving effect to this promise, though in the following year the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley) stirred up the Government by asking a question which was answered by the present Lord Northbrook, then Under Secretary for War, and on the 30th of May, 1862, Sir De Lacy Evans appears to have been unable to contain his impatience and moved—

“That, in the opinion of this House, no further postponement ought to take place in giving effect to the promises of Government, that the Command of Regiments should no longer be purchasable, and that the promotions to that rank should henceforth be regulated by selection upon the responsibility of the Commander-in-Chief.”—[3 Hansard, clxvii. 199.]

But, Sir, by this time the great statesman who had made those promises had gone to his rest, and the country had suffered an irreparable loss. The matter was in other hands. Sir George Lewis and Lord Palmerston replied by making a general defence of army purchase, and announcing that instead of performing the promise which had been made by Lord Palmerston's own Government, the consideration of the question would be postponed to some indefinite period, when the experiment of the absence of purchase might be considered to have been fully tried in the nine regiments which had been transferred to the Crown from the East India Company. It was on this occasion that the noble Lord made his prophecy about the twenty-five years. I must remind the noble Lord that his prediction has only twenty years still to run.

Perhaps, Sir, some light may be thrown upon the secret and effectual cause of the neglect with which the recommendation of the Commission was treated, if we examine the evidence of His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief. He is asked—

“Do you think that the principle of selection which is applicable to colonels of regiments is applicable also to lieutenant-colonels?—I think not; but it is perfectly applicable to colonels.”

“Will you explain to the Commission why that which is applicable to colonels could not be observed with regard to lieutenant-colonels?—Because the colonel does not command the regiment. He is merely the nominal head, and he is selected for services performed in former days, and it is a reward for services, therefore that is a much easier thing than selecting a man to be actively employed at the head of a regiment.”

That is to say that in the case of the colonelcy, which is a sinecure, a place of prestige and emolument, it is proper to apply the principle of selection; but in the case of the lieutenant-colonelcy, which is only a place of responsibility, only a case in which the welfare and the lives of 800 or 1,000 men are at stake, it is impossible to undertake the burden of selecting a man who is fitted for the post. The office which is honorary is to go by merit; the office which demands high intellectual and moral qualities is to go by a complicated system of chance. Sir, the Admiralty are not unwilling to assume the responsibility of providing commanders for twice as many vessels as there are regiments, of which the Horse Guards cannot assume the responsibility of nominating the colonels. Sir, the right hon. Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) taught us that the decrees of the Horse Guards are not to be questioned in this House, and we have learned our lesson. But if the right hon. Baronet will allow me, I will bring forward the opinion of another Royal personage, who was likewise a famous soldier. When King William came to England with a military experience matured by many years of Continental warfare, he applied his earliest period of leisure to the task of putting down purchase among his new subjects. I think that very practical monarch must have stared the first time his Adjutant General told him that there were not enough rich men in the country to officer his cavalry. There may be danger lest people inclined to cavil should make the remark that the Admiralty dare not allow incompetent men to have charge of vessels, because vessels are made of wood and iron, which are tangible materials of very serious cost; and that if a vessel is wrecked by the fault of the commander, the public at once appreciates the pecuniary loss which it has suffered. But a regiment is made of flesh and blood, and may be rendered inefficient by disease, and only those who are conversant with sanitary statistics can assert that such a misfortune was owing to human folly and not to a dispensation of Providence.

Sir, we have often been told in the course of the last year that the cause of the supreme excellence of English administration is that our reforms are never radical reforms; that we never take a stride in the path of progress, but go forward foot by foot; above all, that we never change our old garments for new, but that we patch them up wherever we find a hole. And therefore we are told our institutions are stable; and the most stable of all our institutions is the army. Now, Sir, I do not deny that our military system, under favourable circumstances, has plenty of stability; that is a quality in time of peace, to which you may always attain by simply leaving things alone; but we are told likewise that, anomalous and antiquated as it may be, it works well. Sir, that is precisely what all the soldiers of the old school throughout Europe said of the Prussian military system in the year 1806. The French, with their new-fangled tactics and their mushroom generals, might beat Austrians and Sardinians, but they would never stand against battalion's disciplined and manœuvred after the instructions of the great Frederick. But the battles of Jena and Auerstadt opened the eyes of the soldiers of the old school. A single fortnight placed Prussia at the feet of Napoleon. Then the Prussians took counsel of necessity. They left the old groove. They re-modelled their army from the crown to the foot, and the results were the campaigns of 1813-14-15. And so it is with us. We may talk as much as we like about being a practical people; but how will it all end. Prussia never scruples to alter her organization on a year's notice, and yet nobody denies that their organization works well. Does the Prussian army show in the field any signs of being led by unpractical doctrinaires? We boast of possessing an organization founded on experience and not on theory. Everybody knows that our soldiers are brave, and well drilled; everybody knows that our officers are loyal and courageous; but does anybody believe that in the hour of stress and peril that organization would bear the strain? Not once during the last few weeks, but over and over again, men who have deeply studied the question have said to me, we shall never get rid of purchase till we have a war and a breakdown. If this is the impression among those who are best informed, it is idle to talk of the expense of abolishing purchase. A breakdown would cost us in a fortnight a sum which would buy up all the commissions in the army. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) could tell us how much the breakdown in the Crimea stood the nation in cash; and we can all of us tell what it cost us in reputation.

I will not now enter into a computation of the expense of abolishing purchase, but there are two or three items of saving which I recommend to the attention of the economists in the House. We shall be able largely to diminish that inflated and gigantic non-effective system, which has been raised to its present dimensions in order to compensate officers who have suffered from the effects of the purchase system. On this point I quote the highest authority. In a memorandum laid by the Duke of Wellington before the Select Committee on Army Appointments in 1833, his Grace, speaking of 120 general officers, receiving £456 5s. a year, says—

“They receive from the public an annuity, for which they have sacrificed a capital larger than any that could be required from them, either by the public or any annuity office for the same annuity.”

And of 138 general officers who are titular regimental colonels, he says—

“Being colonels of regiments they cannot be allowed to sell out. Their money is sunk in the service, and is lost to them and their families for ever."

In consequence of these representations the Committee recommended a large increase of the non-effective expenditure, which was eventually carried into effect. Secondly, we must remember that officers should only be indemnified for any loss they may suffer in consequence of the abolition of purchase. In other words, they should receive back from the Government the full current value of their commissions only to the extent to which they would have recovered it if purchase had not been abolished. Everything beyond this would be a gratuitous boon.

Sir, it will doubtless be objected during the debate that the present system provides more rapid promotion for non-purchasing officers than would be afforded by a system of selection based upon seniority. The House is far too indulgent for me to trespass on their time. But if I did I could show that promotion might be greatly quickened by a judicious scheme of retirement. Besides, whatever form the army of reserve and militia may take they must be officered to a great extent from the line, which will provide a large amount of employment of a kind particularly suited to married officers and officers whose health is not equal to foreign service. Sir, in the debate of 1860 a great deal was said about the miserable fate of the French officer. You were told how all who had been abroad must have seen lounging about estaminets men whose upright carriage, close-cropped grizzled hair, and heavy moustaches showed what they had been, and whose haggard faces and threadbare clothes showed painfully what they were, and you were asked whether to that condition you would reduce English officers. Sir, I had lately in my hand a letter from a distinguished officer written from Paris, who said he saw all around him, his juniors taking rank as generals, while he was only a colonel, and could not hope to be promoted for several years. We must never forget that the military Members of your own House, though unselfish enough to be by no means unanimous in support of purchase, all belong to the class which most profits by the present system. There must be a great many Reform Bills before poor officers will sit on these Benches. But since my Motion has been on the Notice Paper, I have received letters which amply show that in many a country village and third-rate watering-place there are poor broken-down men of worth and tried valour who have no unbounded admiration of the purchase system. They do not recognise the hackneyed Horse Guard's dictum that the British service is an advantage to the men who cannot pay as well as to the wealthy man. What is all this talk about men with grizzled hair, hanging about cafés, compared with the fact that no officer, or next to none, unable to purchase, rises to the command of a regiment in time of peace? That in time of war he does so rise, because in time of war this boasted purchase system breaks to pieces in the face of stern facts. Sir, in whatever direction military reformers turn their eyes, whatever work of public utility they endeavour to promote, their efforts are always defeated by the existence of this vast anomaly. In our laudable desire to strengthen and elevate our national army we may pour millions after millions through the hands of the War Secretary; but till purchase is abolished we shall get little or nothing for our money. England has a small army, but she has mighty interests at stake. In that small force every officer should be zealous, intelligent, and skilful in his profession; and this result will never be produced until our officers owe their promotion, not to pounds, shillings, and pence, but to zeal and intelligence, and professional experience and skill. The hon. Member concluded by moving his Resolution.

COLONEL SYKES, in seconding the Motion, said, his hon. Friend (Mr. Trevelyan) in bringing forward the subject had apologized for so doing on the score of youth; but the manner which he had acquitted himself certainly showed any such apology to be unnecessary. As one having the experience of half a century, it might be well that he should corroborate the views of his youthful Friend, and thus furnish a fresh proof that extremes meet. He had always looked upon it as one of the most disastrous results of the system of purchase, that when a man had been eighteen or twenty years in the army, had acquired the experience fitting him to command a regiment, he was forced out of the service by the consideration that if he died the money which he had invested in the previous steps would be lost for ever to his family. So that under the present system the country lost the service of officers at the moment when it was most important that they should be retained. An important question in the constitution of the army was involved in the Motion now before the House. The system of purchase had the effect of excluding from the army some most valuable elements. At present they could not obtain a supply of recruits from the lower middle class of life. There was nothing to induce—on the contrary, there was everything to deter—the sons of tradesmen from entering the army, because they had not the means to purchase and there was no adequate prospect before them. The army of the East Indian Company, on the contrary, was recruited without the slightest difficulty, and from a different class of persons to those who entered the Royal army. In the Indian service there was always something for the young adventurer to look forward to. There were a multitude of appointments—artillery and commissariat conductorships, clerks of works, clerkships in the military departments, &c.—open to men of some little education and station; and many men were induced to go to India upon the chances of success thus held out to them, who could never entertain any hope of advancement in the Royal army. His own personal experience furnished him with many instances in which poor young men of education and accomplishments had entered the Indian army as privates. In a native regiment which he commanded in India his serjeant-major was the son of a Scotch clergyman. That gentleman—Mr. M'Leod—had received a good education under the admirable system of parochial instruction in Scotland. When he (Colonel Sykes) came home in 1820 he recommended him for an appointment to a department where his talents and education would be appreciated. The result was that Mr. M'Leod progressed and became a deputy collector of Scinde, with a salary of £1,200 a year. This was but one example of numerous instances of promotion of a similar character. When he organized the statistical reporter's office for the Bombay Government in 1824, he needed an artist who drew tolerably well and an expert in figures, and he readily found both in the detachment of European artillery at Poona; the artist having been a landscape painter in England and the expert in figures had been educated at the Polytechnic in Paris, and both of them behaved themselves well. The consequence was that the Company's service was generally filled with persons of a higher station than those who entered the ranks of the Royal army. The officers of the English army were, as a body, the first gentlemen in Europe—there was no doubt about that—but he considered it mischievous, imprudent, and impolitic that such a definite line should be drawn between the officers and the men they commanded in the British army. With regard to purchase, it was said that a man was always sure of getting his money back again. He (Colonel Sykes) was not so sure about that. He knew a case that was at present before the War Office. It was that of a captain whose commission was worth £1,800. Having been put a few years ago on half-pay he applied to the late Sir George Lewis, when he was War Minister, to be allowed to sell his commission. Sir George remarked to him that he was getting on in life, and asked whether he would take £1,500 for his commission? The poor man said that the money would be acceptable, and consented to take it; but up to the present moment he had not received a farthing of this £1,500. He (Colonel Sykes) looked for better things from the present head of the War Office. The question was how this evil of purchase was to be remedied. There were £7,000,000 invested in the purchase of commissions, and that, no doubt, made it a serious matter to grapple with the subject. But why not make a beginning? As officers wanted to sell commissions, let a certain number be bought annually by the Government, and in process of time the present evil would be extinguished. They could then give these commissions to persons to be promoted by seniority or for merit. In that way the expenditure which the State would have to incur in doing away with the purchase system might be spread over twenty or thirty years.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, the system of purchasing Commissions in the Army tends greatly to diminish the efficiency of our Military Force."—(Mr. Trevelyan.)

CAPTAIN STANLEY said, that having been several years in the army, and feeling a very deep interest in the welfare of the service, he trusted he should be pardoned if he ventured to trespass upon the attention of the House by offering a few observations on the Motion of his hon. Friend. It seemed to him that the question before them was of a twofold character. They had to look, on the one hand, to the objections attributed to the present system of promotion, and upon the other to the advantages which might be reasonably expected to arise from a change. It was not his intention that evening to go over the ground traversed by his hon. Friend who made the Motion; but there were one or two points upon which it was well to have a fuller discussion than they had as yet received. One of the principal objections which he thought must suggest itself to the present system was that from the very first moment of entering the service an officer was assuming the gravest responsibility that could be thrown upon any man. He said it without fear of contradiction that a young officer entering the service, and fearing the responsibility of having so many human lives placed under his charge, without being required to qualify himself properly for the discharge of the duties he was about to undertake, found himself placed in a most difficult and unenviable position. The point, however, to which he particularly wished to address himself was that of the advantages which he trusted would ensue from a change of system—which, whilst doing away with purchase, would enable the authorities to promote a larger number of men from the ranks than was at present done. It had been said that if they were to raise a certain proportion of officers from the ranks they would inevitably effect a great change in the army, and run the risk of lowering that high standard of gentlemanlike feeling which it was universally admitted the British army possessed above the armies of all other nations. But in dealing with a question like this, he submitted that we should look beyond the immediate effects. We should consider whether, by holding out the hopes of a better career, we should not induce a better class of men to enter the ranks of the service. At present a young man might enter the army with the best intentions and a determination to work hard and to learn his work; but he would soon discover that the life of a soldier was composed of a multitude of small details. Now, it was precisely the knowledge or ignorance of those details on the part of the officer which constituted the difference between the comfort or discomfort of the men placed under him. It was, of course, a considerable disadvantage to the service that officers should enter it without having obtained any knowledge of the duties which they would be called upon to fulfil on their first entrance into the army. He thought if the present system were so far changed as to allow of a greater number of promotions from the ranks we should then have at once a large number of officers who would be fully conversant with the wants and habits of the men under them, and who would be able in many cases to decide upon matters which might be brought before them as regards the comfort of the men with far greater precision and confidence than officers who, however apt and able they might be, had never become practically acquainted with the duties of those below them in station. It was true that under the present system when an officer passed from one rank to another he had to undergo a sort of examination; but this was very different from the examination which would be instituted if the proposed change were to be carried out. The object of the present examination was merely to ascertain whether an officer was positively too ignorant to be promoted to a higher grade. The object was, not to select a good officer, but to keep back a man who was totally unfit, and the subsequent advancement of an officer was in no way dependent upon that examination. One who passed it in an inferior manner stood exactly the same chance of being promoted as one who had passed it well; and, of course, such an examination offered no inducement to officers to exert themselves in the intermediate ranks of their profession. He contended that if a certain number of officers were introduced from the ranks of the army, and were placed for each subsequent grade of promotion in competition with other officers in the service—whether they had entered from a Military College or from elsewhere—the result would be that a higher standard of military knowledge would be, as it were, forced into the profession. The question of officers being selected for command had been so fully discussed in that House that it was unnecessary for him to enter into the subject; but he might, perhaps, venture to add his firm opinion that not only should officers intended for the rank of actual commanders of battalions be taken by selection from the army, but that their subordinate officers, such as majors of regiments, who, in the absence of their superior officers, were likely to be called upon at any moment to take the command, should also be selected on account of their military acquirements. To make his meaning on the subject of examinations more clear he might state that in his opinion they should be confined to military matters, for he could not conceive that, as regarded the regimental work of the army, it was necessary that the officers should be highly qualified in scientific acquirements. Indeed, the probability was that if an officer devoted himself very much to scientific pursuits he would be wasting time which might otherwise be devoted to subjects more practically useful. If the system of promotion by purchase were abolished and a system of promotion partly by seniority and partly by selection substituted for it, he could not understand how the staff appointments could be taken from the army in the same way as at present. By separating the staff of the army from the regimental commissions a great injustice would be prevented, which might otherwise occur from following out strictly the plan of seniority. If the plan of seniority were strictly carried out, and the staff of the army were chosen as at present, it would be perfectly possible for an officer to obtain his promotion, to leave his regiment, and become an entire stranger to his men, and then to rejoin his regiment in time to gain his next step. Such a state of things was obviously most undesirable. Feelings of apprehension had been entertained, even by officers well acquainted with the army, that the present standard of honour and gentlemanly feeling in the service might in some degree be lowered by promoting men from the ranks. Now he (Mr. Stanley) confessed he was one of those who did not entertain that apprehension, for it must be remembered that, as a rule, the men who rose and who had taken the trouble to qualify themselves to rise from the ranks, must be men with a certain amount of application and energy, and there could be no doubt that when placed in the society of their brother officers they would endeavour to conform, as far as possible, to the manners of those among whom they found themselves. If, however, he was to look exclusively to social position he admitted that that must to a certain extent be altered; but the army ought not be regarded as a mere social gathering. He was not aware whether his hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trevelyan) intended to press his Motion to a division; but he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State, even if he were not prepared at once to accede to the Motion, would be induced to take the subject at no very distant day into his serious consideration. He could not impress too deeply upon the House the feeling which he entertained that this great change could best be carried out at a time when the matter could be carefully considered, and not when we were embarrassed in the midst of a war by the break down of the present system. While he hoped that the system of purchase would be abolished, and that a larger number of officers would be promoted from the ranks, he admitted that we ought not to look for a supply of officers from that source alone. Although there might be some difficulty in carrying out the idea, he still maintained that all officers should be made acquainted with the duties they would be afterwards called upon to discharge. In this respect an excellent example was set by the Austrian army, for all officers on joining it were attached to regiments as cadets, associating with the officers, but learning practically and thoroughly the duties of those whom they were afterwards called on to command. He thought it must be very disadvantageous to draw so broad a line of distinction between the two classes of the army as was done at present, and he concurred with the hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeen (Colonel Sykes) that it discouraged many young men from entering the army who would otherwise willingly serve in the ranks for a certain number of years if there was a prospect of their eventually obtaining a commission. In conclusion, he admitted that there were great difficulties in the way of carrying out this great change; but he could not but express a hope that before long the existing system would be abolished, and that the army would cease to be the only service in which responsible positions could be purchased for a sum of money.

COLONEL NORTH said, he could not understand how such a system as that proposed by the hon. Gentleman could be carried out; but there might be no great difficulty in carrying out the system if the country was only prepared with the £ s. d. During the Peninsula War volunteers were attached to regiments, but when the peace was concluded they did not know what to do with them, and the system was discontinued. He was not at all surprised at the Motion made by the hon. Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trevelyan), who, in addressing his constituents, had said that in the English army power was gained by purchase and maintained by the lash. The hon. Member might, however, have done English officers the justice to say that, however they obtained the power, they wielded it with justice, kindness, and consideration. As to the army being held together by the lash, he left the House to judge how far the statement was justified by a Return showing that, on an average of ten years, in an army of over 200,000 men, scattered in all part of the world, the number of men flogged was only 2 and a fraction per 1,000. When this question was discussed in 1856, it was brought forward by General Sir De Lacy Evans, who could not personally complain that merit was not rewarded, for on the 12th of January, 1815, he found himself a captain in His Majesty's service, and on the 18th of June following he was a lieutenant-colonel. No one could find fault with that, for every advance was gained by gallantry in the field. He had seen service in India and in the Peninsula War, and he did not bring the matter forward because he had any grievance. The Motion was seconded by the present Earl de Grey, than whom no one had the interest of the army more at heart. Earl de Grey—then Lord Goderich—proposed that one-third of the vacancies in the army should be filled up by merit, and two-thirds by seniority; and Mr. Ellice thought that there was a necessity for inquiry, if only to satisfy the demands of public opinion. The recommendation of the Commission of 1854, of which he was a member, that in the non-purchase corps, the Royal Artillery, and the Royal Engineers, Her Majesty should more frequently exercise her prerogative and take officers out of the regular rotation of promotion and promote them to higher ranks on account of merit, encountered great opposition from the corps, and even a modified recommendation was met by a protest. They declared they would infinitely prefer the introduction of purchase into their corps. As to the heartburnings that were alleged to be caused by officers being passed over under the purchase system, were not the same heartburnings as likely or more likely to occur under the system of promotion by selection? There were now three modes of promotion—purchase, seniority, and selection. Staff appointments were filled up by selection, and could not be purchased. No complaints were made against the regimental system to which purchase is confined; but during the Crimean War it was said that the staff officers were not up to the work. If that were so, it was not the fault of the officers but that of the country. No opportunities were given by collecting bodies of troops to instruct staff officers; and if the country was so penurious as not to afford officers proper opportunities of learning their duties, let the country bear the blame of their inefficiency. If the purchase system were abolished, the expenditure of some £8,000,000 would be necessary, besides an enormous increase annually in the full-pay and half-pay retirement; and he did not believe that any Minister would be likely to propose such an outlay. The hon. Gentleman had stated that he had received a large number of letters from officers complaining of the present system; no doubt they came from officers who had recently been passed over. But, on the other hand, it must not be supposed that all officers were averse to the present system, for many had said to him, "Whatever you do, vote for the continuance of the purchase system in the interests of the poor man." If his hon. Friend divided the House on this Question, he should certainly oppose him.

MR. A. W. F. GREVILLE-NUGENT said, there was a point that had been altogether lost sight of during this discussion—the question of the sufficiency of pay to our officers; and the House would have to consider before they sanctioned any change in the present system—whether an officer promoted from the ranks would be able to live on the present rate of pay. As to promotion from the ranks, soldiers had a greater respect for officers who were of a superior class than for those who were promoted from among themselves, and they gave a more willing obedience to them than they did to those who had been their comrades. It had been urged as a reason in favour of promotion from the ranks that the men had more energy than their officers; but he defied any one to point out an instance where the duties could have been better performed by men from the ranks than they had been under the purchase system. If the present officers could not discharge their duties efficiently he was certain the men could not. The proposed change, if adopted, would change the whole tone of the army. By the new system, they would have in the same regiment men of a different class to their officers, about whom very little would be known; whereas, by the present system, more or less was known of the status of every officer who joined a regiment; and in most cases they were the sons of men who had served their country in the field. To promote men from the plough or from a village draper's shop, because he happened to be rather smarter than his comrades, and because he could read and write pretty well, would destroy, as he had said, the whole tone of a regiment. In the artillery, where there was no purchase, promotion was very slow, because an officer had no object in leaving the corps, not being able to better himself; but in the army vacancies were frequently arising, because men could sell out and obtain their money. Our army had ever been well led, and he doubted if they would improve it by the adoption of promotion by the abandonment of the purchase system. These constant discussions about the army, such as the everlasting question of flogging in the army, and promotion without purchase, had the effect of putting things into the men's heads that would never else have got there, and probably made them discontented.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, it was absolutely necessary for the safety of the country that our military service should be in the most perfect order; for our riches offered the greatest temptation to plunder in the case of war. The British army must necessarily be a small one; and it ought therefore to be organized and administered as efficiently as possible. But he feared that it could not compare with foreign armies in respect of organization and preparedness for war; and that upon any sudden emergency it would be found in a state of unpreparedness which might prove most dangerous. Now, this ought not to be. We had brave men for soldiers—there was no country in the world in which the men were more active or more fond of military pursuits. We possessed every facility for organization; and if the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would devote his attention to the subject, he believed that it would be perfectly easy to change our military system greatly for the better; and, in particular, to recruit our forces without difficulty. He should exceedingly like to have the present system investigated in order to ascertain whether it would not be better to enlist a man for a short period of service—such as three, four, or five years—just long enough to make him a soldier—and then send him away under no other obligation than that of serving in the reserve? If they were to do so, and if men were enlisted and taught a trade, families would be desirous of having some of their members in the army, and there would, he believed, be no lack of men to fill the ranks. Let them look at the state of things in Prussia. In the Prussian army, the soldiers were so intelligent and well taught as to require only five officers to 250 men, where we had fourteen or fifteen. And why should we not have in our army carpenters, tailors, builders, and, in fact, men able to do everything that the army wanted? Why should we be dependant on civilians for erecting huts for the men at Aldershot or making their clothes? If a system of this kind were carried out, a great economy would be effected. If the right hon. Gentleman were to turn his attention to the investigation of the whole question of Army Reform, he would confer upon the service the greatest benefit which it had received for many years.

MAJOR JERVIS said, that the hon. Gentleman who had brought this subject forward (Mr. Trevelyan) had told the House that they would improve the efficiency of the army if they were to alter the present system. But he should like to know how they would improve it? He should like to know in what country, in what climate, on what field had the British officer not sustained the reputation of his country? Was it in China—in India—in Persia—in the Punjab? Was it in the Peninsula, or the Crimea, or where was it that he had failed? He could perfectly well understand a Member on the Liberal side of the House bringing forward this question of promotion from the ranks; but then let it be brought forward distinctly, and discussed upon its merits. Before they could raise a large body of men from the ranks they must first increase the pay of our officers. He had heard with the greatest surprise the statement that by doing away with the purchase system they would get rid of the half-pay list. Such a statement would not bear examination for a moment. There were non-commissioned officers who had served with him, and he should be glad to see them commissioned officers to-morrow; but if they were to ask these men their opinion on the subject, they would tell them that while non-commissioned officers they could live, but as commissioned officers they could not. And what were they to retire upon? He was acquainted with a most valuable body of men, the Coast Artillery, all the officers of which had risen from the ranks; and what was their pay? Why it averaged from 6s. 4d. to 10s. 6d. He knew a non-commissioned officer who had been promoted from the ranks; he had a wife and children to maintain, and had to live on

6s. 4d. a day, which was next to starvation. Now was that what hon. Gentlemen wished to bring about? He had acted in common with the hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeen (Colonel Sykes), who had seconded this Motion, in endeavouring to get the question of the Indian officers' claims settled. What was it that had led to the difficulty in that matter? The officers suffered because under the system they could get no promotion, and so they agreed to subscribe to a fund for the purpose of buying out the senior officers and enabling them to retire more quickly. The Government having failed to provide proper retiring allowances, got the officers to do that which they themselves ought to have done; and all that was to save the half-pay list. Now, upon this question he was perfectly impartial. He did not belong to a purchase corps, he was getting on in years, and was rather low in rank. Well, then, being thus impartial, he could bear his testimony to this—that it was the present system of purchase which enabled us to officer our corps with junior men, and when a man was too old enabled him to retire. He hoped this discussion would be carried on in a business-like manner. Let it not go to the country that the House was opposed to seeing men raised from the ranks when they had fairly gained their position. But if they were to encourage promotion from the ranks let them place those who were promoted in a position which would at least enable them to live. The hon. and gallant Gentleman (Captain Stanley) who had made so excellent a speech, had entirely overlooked this point. When the Chancellor of the Exchequer was willing to grant a sum of money to enable them to promote men largely from the ranks, he for one would vote for it. But it was entirely a matter of pounds, shillings, and pence. Let it not go forth to the country that the House was of opinion that a non-commissioned officer, when he received a commission, could live upon his pay, which was something like what a first-class mason could earn, a good deal less than a first-class carpenter, and still less than a clerk in a commercial house or bank would receive. If hon. Gentlemen really meant what they said, let them support a Motion for giving proper pay to the officers of the army, and then they would soon do away with the purchase system.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, both sides of the House will admit that the modest terms in which the hon. Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trevelyan), in the commencement of his speech, apologized for dealing with a question which had been formerly in the hands of so distinguished a man as Sir De Lacy Evans, were quite unnecessary. In the first place, the mode in which the hon. Gentleman treated the subject was never exceeded for clearness or candour; and, in the next place, it was impossible to forget that the hon. Gentleman is perhaps the fittest man in this House to urge the views he has brought before us, being the son of Sir Charles Trevelyan, who, whatever difference of opinion might prevail as to the merits of this question, has, beyond all doubt, devoted for a long period his great ability and perseverance to its consideration, and has done so in a manner which must have convinced everybody acquainted with what he has written that he could have had no other motive than one the most patriotic and disinterested. I am not at all disparaging what has fallen from the hon. Gentleman opposite when I say that, having read what Sir Charles Trevelyan has written on this question, I am familiar not only with the arguments but even with the extracts which the hon. Gentleman has brought forward with so much ability. I am quite willing to admit, as the result of my own study of this question, that it is impossible to read the Report of the Royal Commission, the various correspondence of Sir Charles Trevelyan and the pamphlets which he has published on this subject, without being convinced that there are great and serious anomalies in this system of army purchase. There are many things connected with that system which are fairly open to criticism, and which at least suggest very serious doubts whether, if we were to commence anew, we should found promotion upon the purchase system which now prevails. I need hardly add, therefore, that I am by no means desirous to be understood as committing myself to any approbation in the abstract of our present system; and I feel it the more necessary to say this, because if the hon. Gentleman presses his Motion to a division, I shall feel it my duty to vote against it. I cannot think that the time has arrived when it would be safe for the House to sanction so strong a declaration as that embodied in the Motion which the hon. Gentleman has submitted. While acknowledging the general fairness of his statement, I feel bound to take exception to the expression of which he made use when he urged, as one of his arguments against the present system of purchase and sale of commissions, that it was "illicit and clandestine." I presume the hon. Gentleman meant to refer not to the general system, but to the practice, which is unfortunately not unknown, of purchasing being carried on to an excess inconsistent with law and regulation. It is very important that there should be no danger of its going forth to the public that the officers of the British army are carrying on anything that can be called illicit or clandestine in the sale and purchase of commissions, for it is under army regulations, and is perfectly legitimate. Every one, however, who takes an interest in the welfare and character of our army must regret the fact mentioned by the hon. Gentleman, that, although there is an Act on the statute book which renders officers subject to be cashiered if they purchase their commissions, and makes the sale of them a misdemeanour at law, the offence of selling commissions for sums far beyond the regulation price is not uncommon. Whatever opinion may be entertained on the abstract question of purchase, we must all agree that it is very desirable that such transactions should be put an end to, and that law and practice should be brought into harmony. While our present system is no doubt in some respects anomalous and objectionable, it is one, as the hon. Gentleman has reminded us, of great antiquity. He amused the House by referring us to the days of Pepys, and to a negotiation carried on by him for the sale of his commission as Clerk of the Acts. Now, the system of sale and purchase of commissions in the army dates back from a period very nearly, if not quite, as remote as that; and with the exception of an interval of only four or five years in the reign of William III., it has prevailed from that time to the present day. That is surely a fact which ought to have some consideration. Then, again, it must be remembered the circumstance was entirely passed over by the hon. Gentleman, but it has been referred to by the hon. and gallant Members for Harwich (Major Jervis) and Westmeath (Mr. Greville-Nugent), that, whatever its merits or demerits, it has been under this system that the British army has acquired its great renown. Under that system it has during centuries achieved a glorious history, and has acquired such laurels as to give it a rank equal to or higher than any other army in the civilized world.

Sir John Pakington

These are facts which the hon. Gentleman should not, I think, have passed over when considering whether or not our military system might be improved by the abolition of this system. Upon another and by no means unimportant part of the subject the hon. Gentleman touched indeed, but not so fully as it deserved—namely, the expense which would be involved in the change which he proposes. My hon. and gallant Friend behind me (Colonel North) rather overstated the present value of the commissions held by officers in the army when he put it at £8,000,000, for, as far as the last official statement enables me to judge, the value according to regulation price is but slightly over £7,000,000. The question, then, arises, what proportion of this immense sum would have to be repaid if the change were made. The view of Sir Charles Trevelyan is that a great number of officers would accommodate themselves to the new system, and would be content to persevere in their military service, receiving full pay on retirement; so that only a small proportion of that sum would have to be paid to retiring officers as compensation for the loss of their commissions. Upon that point, however, a difference of opinion exists. The subject has been referred to Committees on several occasions, and was in 1859 referred to a War Office Committee. They carried on a correspondence with Sir Charles Trevelyan, and differed widely from him in many respects. Sir Charles Trevelyan put the sum which it would be necessary to refund at a much lower figure; but the Committee were of opinion that a sum between £3,000,000 and £4,000,000 would have to be provided out of the public Exchequer to repay officers for the sale of their commissions. When, therefore, we consider that it was part of Sir Charles Trevelyan's plan that the pay of all officers should be raised, and that in order to avoid stagnation in promotions officers should have full pay on retiring, and when we add to this increased expense a sum of no less than £3,000,000 or £4,000,000 for compensation, it is obvious that only a great concurrence of opinion could induce any Government to recommend Parliament to adopt a change of such magnitude. Now, at present, the opinion both of the military and the public is very much divided. I believe the preponderance of military opinion is, rightly or wrongly, in favour of maintaining the present system—whether the preponderance of public opinion is on the same side I am not prepared to say. But, even assuming it to be desirable that the system should be abolished, it is clearly one of such long-standing, and is so deep-rooted in the practice of the army, that until a much greater concurrence of public and military opinion is arrived at the change cannot be carried out. Another point on which a difference of opinion prevails between those who have originated and those who have investigated the proposal is this—that while Sir Charles Trevelyan put the retirements from the list of captains at 500, the War Office Committee estimated them at no less than 2,000; so that before we can commit ourselves to such a measure it is necessary to understand all its bearings. Another aspect of the question which has been alluded to by my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Harwich (Major Jervis) is the danger of impairing the vigour and efficiency of the army by increasing the difficulty of promotion. Now, we have before us the experience of three different systems of promotion—namely, those which exist in the Navy, in the Royal Marines, and in the Royal Artillery and Royal Engineers; and what do we learn from them? Why, that there is a great difficulty in keeping up a flow of promotion, and in at the same time retaining in our service officers in the prime and vigour of life, when promotion is regulated by seniority. The hon. Gentleman referred to the French army; but that, I think, is an instance unfavourable to his views. There the plan has been adopted of compulsory retirement, at a comparatively early age, according to their rank. I believe a lieutenant-general is compelled to retire at sixty-five, a major-general at sixty-two, and so on, some of the officers having to retire at fifty-three. If my memory serves me right, Sir Charles Trevelyan has suggested a plan not very dissimilar. But how does it operate in the French army? Officers are compelled to retire, complaining and dissatisfied, and they are so reluctant to do so, on account of the very inadequate allowances which they receive, that the junior officers do not seek to be advanced, because the higher they get the earlier the age at which they must retire on an inadequate allowance; so that, instead of the junior ranks being filled, as in our army, by men in the prime of life, they are occupied by men who are much older than is compatible with the interests of the service. Here, then, are warnings which should induce the greatest caution in adopting the plan which the hon. Gentleman has suggested, unless we see our way to the avoidance of those evils to which I have adverted. Sir Charles Trevelyan attaches great importance to a proper system of retirement, and it is quite clear that without such a system it would be extremely dangerous to expose our army to the risks of the change which is proposed. I am quite aware that Sir Charles Trevelyan does not admit that the cost is so great as I suppose; but there is a wide difference between us, and many high authorities differ from Sir Charles Trevelyan on this subject, and are of opinion that the changes he recommends would call for a great increase in our expenditure, and would largely augment the burden of the army. The objections to the purchase system may be divided into two classes—first as to the effect upon the individual officer, and secondly as to its effect upon the public interest. The objection in regard to the individual officer turns chiefly upon two points. The first is the hardship to officers of seeing juniors placed over their heads; and the other is the cruel loss which the death of an officer involves, in the sacrifice by his family of the money paid for his commission. There is no denying that in both these respects the operation of the purchase system is very hard upon officers. It is no doubt very mortifying to officers fond of their profession and anxious for promotion to see their juniors pass over their heads. I am not sufficiently conversant with the profession to decide upon such a point; but it is gravely argued by those who know the army well, that under the system of purchase officers who are unable to buy are sometimes enabled to get their promotion quicker than they otherwise would do. If this is a true view of the question, it goes far to answer that portion of the argument. With regard to the cases where, by the death of an officer, the family lose the value of the commission, it must not be forgotten that there is a great mitigation of this hardship by the Royal warrant, under which the price of the commission is restored to the family where the officers have been either killed in action or have died within a certain period of time after receiving their wounds. No doubt there must be cases of hardship; but it must not be forgotten that men enter upon their career in the army with their eyes open to the risks they run. The strongest argument in favour of the views of the hon.

Gentleman is the public bearing of this question in connection with the command of regiments. In the Report of the Royal Commission this subject is touched upon in a manner that deserves the most serious consideration, and there is a very strong passage, which I will read. They say—

“The command of a regiment is an important trust, yet it is admitted by high authority that several officers have attained the position of lieutenant-colonel who were unequal to the command of the regiments which they held.”

The Royal Commission proceed, in the latter part of their Report, to give their views on the subject. They say—

“In this respect, therefore, we think that the good of the service will be best promoted by an alteration, and we recommend that hereafter the lieutenant-colonelcy of a regiment should no longer be purchasable, but should be an appointment made by the selection of the Commander-in-Chief from all the majors in that branch of the service. The principle of selection may be most advantageously tried in the appointment to the command of a regiment. The Commander-in-Chief has, it is said, the means, through the information collected at head-quarters, of knowing the character for efficiency and intelligence of every field officer in the army. The responsibility of these appointments will rest on the Commander-in-Chief, and the attention of the whole army will be necessarily fixed on his exercise of this power.”

Here is a distinct recommendation by the Royal Commission that in this respect a material change should be made. I think it is a matter of very grave doubt whether we ought to deal with this question piecemeal, and whether it is not better to leave it until we can grapple with the whole subject. You must recollect that it will be a change of the greatest magnitude, amounting to a revolution in our whole military system, and one that no one would recommend without the greatest care and the greatest deliberation. The Royal Commission says—

“If the purchase system be abolished, it will become indispensable, for the purpose of maintaining the efficiency of the British army, to adopt a new system of retirement and promotion—namely, to make retirement after a fixed age, or period of service compulsory, and to give promotions by selection. It has been further shown that compulsory retirement will be alone an inadequate substitute for the sale of commissions; but we consider that its partial adoption would facilitate the measure we propose for the selection of lieutenant-colonels, while we do not suggest disturbing the existing system as regards the purchase and sale of commissions, up to the rank of major inclusive.”

Considering how short a time I have held my present office, it would be presumptuous on my part to commit myself to a distinct pledge on the Motion before the House in the face of this Report of the Royal Commission so recently made. Neither can I forget that I have the high authority of the Duke of Wellington in the Report of the Royal Commission on the same subject in 1840. That Commission, in their Report, said—

“It is manifested in these returns that by far the larger portion of officers are perfectly qualified for their duties, and it is equally apparent that this efficiency is maintained by the system of purchase.”

This Report is signed by the Duke of Wellington, the Duke of Richmond, Lords Melville, Howick, and Hill, Sir Charles Adam, Sir Thomas Hardy, and Sir Henry Hardinge, and other officers of the highest consideration. The hon. Baronet the Member for Buckingham (Sir Harry Verney) has expressed a hope that I will avail myself of this opportunity of considering the whole subject of Army Reform. This is a subject as difficult as it is important. I feel deeply how difficult and how important it is. This question of promotion by purchase cannot be considered to stand alone. Our whole military system at the present moment is in a state of transition. We have lately had presented to us the Report of a Royal Commission on our system of Recruiting for the Army. They name two objects of primary importance—one is, how to make the army more acceptable to the country and facilitate recruiting; the other is how to carry on recruiting without those degrading and demoralizing scenes which now unhappily attend it. Only the other day my right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Huntingdon (General Peel) submitted a proposal for creating an army of reserve and improving the whole position of the British soldier. It will be my duty within a few days to lay on the table of this House the Report of a Commission, over which Lord Strathnairn presided, and which recommends very considerable changes in the administrative staff of the army. It will shortly be my duty to consider the recommendations of the Commission. These recommendations cannot be carried out without very considerable changes in our military system. I hope the hon. Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trevelyan) will see that I have no prejudiced views. Whatever may be the decision of the House to-night, I reserve to myself the right to consider all those recommendations with regard to purchase in the army to the best of my ability. I have listened with attention and respect to the hon. Gentleman opposite. I have read the able publications of his father; and I hope he will be of opinion that I only wish to deal with the question with the desire to arrive at the best decision. I therefore trust the hon. Member will not think it his duty to press this Motion to a division.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I cannot agree with what has been said by the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Greville-Nugent) that these discussions are calculated to do harm to the army. On the contrary, I think that the country is greatly indebted to the hon. Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trevelyan) for bringing it forward, and in so able a manner. I believe that discussion in this House and in the country is the way, and the only way, in which this question can be settled; and that when once the subject is understood in all its bearings by the House and the country then, and not till then, the question will be settled. I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War that this system of purchase is full of anomalies and objections; and I believe that there is no true friend to the army who would not be glad to see the system abolished if we could only devise a system without similar anomalies and objections. But, while I do not hesitate to confess that that is my opinion, I still do most earnestly join with the right hon. Gentleman in asking my hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth not to persevere to a division on this question to-night. I think my hon. Friend may be perfectly satisfied with the support he has received and the discussion which has followed his Motion; and I may add that I think he may also be satisfied with the tone of the speech just delivered by the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman has assured us that he has no prejudice on this subject, and I think we may understand his speech as a pledge that he will take into his consideration, among the other changes which he contemplates for the organization of the army, the possibility or expediency of likewise introducing some changes in the system of purchase. But, in pressing my hon. Friend not to divide, I must say I think that neither in this House nor out of doors is public opinion ripe for coming to a decision on this great subject. It is surely some proof that the state of the public mind is not one in which this question can now be decided, that during the whole time when I had the honour to be connected with the War Office, or during the three Sessions of Parliament, the subject of purchase in the army was never once mentioned within these walls. If such be the condition of public opinion—and I believe the silence on this subject has lasted more than three years—I appeal to my hon. Friend whether it is not rather premature to ask us to come to a decision, after one evening's debate, on so momentous a matter? Let my hon. Friend remember what it is that is involved in this question. Before the House can arrive at any decision upon it it must know what is the system which it is proposed to substitute for the present one. Purchase in the army, objectionable as it may be in many respects, no doubt affords a tolerably rapid system of promotion in the service; and something must be substituted for it if it is to be abolished. It is easy to say you will substitute a system of mixed selection and seniority; but what is there involved in that substitution? The House and the country must be prepared to do certain things which I do not believe it is at all ready to do. We must be prepared, in the first place, to pay the sum of money that will be necessary to carry into effect the plan proposed to be substituted; and before we can pay it we must know what that sum is. I do not believe that my hon. Friend or any Member of this House is capable of forming an opinion at the present time as to what sum the country will be called upon to pay to get rid of this system. However, you must pay compensation to officers for any pecuniary loss which may be suffered. In the next place, you would probably have to pay, in addition to the regulated price of the commissions, the extra price paid for them. In the third place—and this, I think, is a part of the subject which is rather forgotten—you would have to provide an adequate and liberal system of full-pay retirement, in order to give the same amount of promotion which is provided for under the present system. And, in the fourth place, I believe it is perfectly true, as stated by the hon. and gallant Member for Harwich (Major Jervis), in order to do any good, in order to reap any substantial advantage from the change, it would be necessary to revise your whole scale of pay and allowances to officers. I do not now say whether it may not be right for the House to ask the country to incur such an expenditure; but I ask whether the House is prepared to call upon the country to incur it, and whether the feeling entertained on this subject is sufficiently strong to justify us in pledging the country to pay such a sum of money for such a purpose? I believe it is not; and that the first thing which is required—instead of asking the House to come to a decision on the system of purchase in the army—is to make ourselves much more acquainted than we are with what the real cost of interfering with that system would be. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the Report of a Committee which I think he said sat in 1859. I know not if there would be any public inconvenience in laying the Report of that Committee on the table of this House; but if I might venture to give advice to my hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trevelyan), I would suggest that unless there be any reason against it he should move that a copy of that Report should be laid before us, and then the House would probably be able to form some opinion on what are the nature and amount of the expenditure involved in this proposed change. But there is another thing which the House must be prepared to do before it consents to this Motion—namely, not only to pay the sum of money, whatever it may be, which that change would involve, but to put an amount of trust in the highest military authority of this country, which I do not believe it is at present disposed to do. It is always said that you will substitute for the existing system a mixed system of selection and seniority; but does the House consider what is meant when you speak of a system of selection? What is meant is that the Horse Guards or the Commander-in-Chief, or the Secretary of State for War—I know not who, but the highest military authority, whoever he may be, in this country—is to have a certain power of selecting officers for promotion from the whole of any particular rank. Now, we know perfectly well that this House and the country are both—I will not say too ready, but very ready—to take exception to any act of the Commander-in-Chief; and does not the House think that when in the case of every promotion which is made there is a possibility that several very deserving officers may be passed over, complaints will not be rife, or that the Commander-in-Chief or the War Office will not be in daily and almost hourly dispute with this House? Unless this House is prepared to place greater confidence than it has shown any disposition to place in the military authorities, the system of selection is impossible. There is only one other point to which I shall advert, and that is what my hon. Friend said with regard to the scheme which was at one time adopted by Lord Herbert, but not carried out. I think my hon. Friend could not have been acquainted with all the circumstances of the case when he stated that that scheme was dropped entirely from the opposition of the Commander-in-Chief. The Commander-in-Chief did what was perfectly right in the matter—namely, he stated frankly and openly before the Commission the objections which he had to the proposal; but when the Government overruled his objections, I believe he declared in his place in the House of Lords that, though he still retained those objections, he would not press them, but would do his best to carry out the plan; and from what I know of his Royal Highness I am satisfied he would have done so. But that scheme was dropped, I believe, not from the opposition of the Commander-in-Chief so much as from the want of support in this House. It did not satisfy the advocates of the total abolition of purchase in the army; it was, of course, opposed by those who were in favour of the present system; it had not the good fortune to please any party in this House; and that, I believe, was the principal reason why it was not more vigorously pressed. The scheme would have cost a considerable sum of money; no doubt it would also have entailed some of the difficulties which I have mentioned as incidental to any system of selection; and I think the Government of the day, if they did not find that the scheme was satisfactory to any party, or would be properly supported, were perfectly right in not placing the Commander-in-Chief in a position of such difficulty as he would have occupied if it had, under those circumstances, been persevered with. I do not say that that scheme should not be revived; but, if it be revived, there ought to be some prospect of its being much more warmly supported than it was before.

MR. TREVELYAN, in reply, said, he wished to give one or two simple reasons why he intended to press his Motion to a division. The Secretary of State for War had made a speech that was very gratifying to him—first because of the very kind things he had said of himself, and next because of the way in which he had spoken of one whose reputation was far dearer to him than his own. But the right hon. Gentleman had not answered any of the principal objections which he had stated to the purchase system. Indeed, the right hon. Gentleman's one answer was the consideration of expense. But on that side of the House this matter was thought to be so important that it was worth while incurring any necessary expense rather than that the system of purchase should not be got rid of. The noble Lord who had just sat down (the Marquess of Hartington) said that the public mind was not yet ripe on that question, and that, therefore, a division ought not to be taken upon it. He (Mr. Trevelyan) maintained, on the contrary, that that was just the reason why they should have a division upon it, for that was the way to ripen public opinion. The principal vocation of this Parliament was to start questions which a Reformed Parliament may run down. He wished therefore to know how the question stood: and who was for him, and who against him.

WEST INDIA BISHOPS AND CLERGY BILL.—LEAVE.—FIRST READING.

MR. REMINGTON MILLS moved for leave to introduce a Bill to repeal the several Acts granting and regulating the appropriation of £20,300 from the Consolidated Fund for the Ecclesiastical Establishments in the West Indies, excepting so far as to continue their allowances to the present recipients until their promotion, resignation, or decease. As he understood that his Motion would not be opposed by the Government, he should confine himself on the present occasion by stating that it was not his intention in making the Motion to interfere in any way with existing rights, as his Bill would only carry out, in the case of the West Indies, the same rule that had been applied to other colonies, and by which, in the case of the British North American Colonies, the annual amount had been reduced from £12,000 to £3,000 by the falling in of lives. He trusted that when the Bill came on for discussion it would receive the sanction of the House.

MR. ADDERLEY, on the part of the Government, said, he would not offer any opposition to the introduction of the Bill.

VOL. CLXXXVI. [THIRD SERIES.]

It was a measure he had himself given notice of some years ago, but deferred for more considerate treatment. He was of opinion that the measure ought to be accompanied by considerable safeguards, for anything like a precipitate repeal of the Acts in question might lead to the production of great mischief, injustice to individuals, and injury to the Church, and even involve a breach of faith with our colonies in the West Indies. Moreover, anything like a precipitate repeal of the Acts would have a tendency to prevent the object which the hon. Member had in view. Not only the present but the last Government had had the subject under consideration, and had even taken steps in the direction of this measure, and both Governments had come to the conclusion that the Treasury ought to be relieved from the charge in question as opportunity occurred. He was of the opinion that this was desirable in the interests not only of the British taxpayer, but also of the Church itself in the West Indies; for both civil and religious institutions thrived best when extraneous support of this description was withdrawn from them, and when they rested on resources on the spot. But it was necessary that a certain amount of discretion should be left in the Executive or Legislature of this country to prevent the confusion which might arise from a sudden change. Not only must existing interests be saved, but a power of gradual reduction must somewhere be reserved; as also a power to anticipate vacancies, and so facilitate the new arrangement. He would go more fully into the question on a future occasion; but at present, while he assented to the introduction of the Bill, the Government reserved to themselves the power of dealing with it afterwards as they might think fit.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to relieve the Consolidated Fund from the charge of the Salaries of future Bishops and other Ecclesiastical Dignitaries in the West Indies, ordered to be brought in by Mr. REMINGTON MILLS, Mr. BAZLEY, and Mr. LAMONT.

MR. HUNT said, he rose to propose a Vote of £402,000 for advances for the purchase of the site and for other purposes in connection with the new Courts of Justice.

MR. SELWYN inquired what would be the total cost of the site, and how far the original Estimate had been exceeded?

MR. HUNT could not state what the cost of the site would be, as the question of enlarging the site was still under the consideration of the Commission. The House would not be precluded from considering that matter by the adoption of the present Vote.

RAILWAYS (GUARDS' AND PASSENGERS' COMMUNICATION) BILL—[Bill 39.]

(Mr. Henry B. Sheridan, Sir Patrick O'Brien.)

SECOND READING.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN moved the second reading of this Bill. He said, that it was the same measure he had introduced last year, and which had been referred to a Select Committee. Its object was to establish some means of communication between passengers in railway trains and the guards in charge of them. There was hardly a train conveying passengers, or any other kind of train, which was not at present provided with the means of communication between the guard and the driver. He believed that the mode of communication established was by rope or wire, which rang a bell close to the ear of the engineer. All he asked by this Bill was, that a similar means of communication with the guard should be extended to travellers. It was not intended to enable the passenger to interfere in any way with the driver of a train, but to communicate with the guard, who would see whether there was anything materially wrong, such as a carriage off the line or a tire off a wheel, which required that the train should be stopped, or whether it might proceed to the next station. He believed that no difficulty would be found in establishing the means of communication between the guards and the passengers. Having recently travelled in the North of Germany, in Belgium, and in France, he could bear testimony to the precautions taken in those countries in this respect. It was maintained at all hours of the day and night. The Bill contained penalties on companies not adopting the proposed communication, and upon those who maliciously interfered with the machinery of it. It did not provide for any special means of communication, but left it to the several railway companies to say what should be its character,—the Board of Trade or the ordinary inspectors of railways determining whether it was efficient or not. The South-Eastern Railway, much to its credit, had established efficient and complete means of communication of the kind required. There was no poverty of invention in the suggestion of plans, 300 or 400 of which, on different principles, had come under his notice. The South-Eastern Railway Company had recently made an experimental trip, and the experiments in the way of passenger and guard communication had been quite successful. It was unnecessary to say that if some such means had been in operation on their lines of railway, some frightful accidents might have been averted, and minor casualties could be prevented by the same precautions. What were the objections to the Bill? One was that there existed no necessity for legislation on this subject, and another was that if a means of communication between passengers and guards were established they would have old women travelling by rail needlessly interfering with it. The points to be considered, in order to prove the question of necessity, were those in connection with that species of accident which perilled the safety of an entire train—such, for instance, as an accident caused by one of the advanced carriages of a train slipping off the rails, or a fire, which, after smouldering for some time, burst into a flame. In connection with this point, he should like to read a short extract from a letter written by Mr. William Holbrook, of Nottingham—

“The Government Inspector’s Report of Railways for five years, 1859-60-2-3-4, shows that 1,132 persons were killed, and 2,911 persons were injured during the same period. In one accident alone the company paid about £34,000. On November 28, 1866, near Hitchin, a train was on fire, the passengers were whistling, shouting, and banging the carriage doors for nearly a quarter of an hour before they could make the guard hear. If my plans had been in operation at the time the train would have been stopped in half a minute from the time the passengers knew it was on fire. For the year 1865 thirteen railway companies paid compensation for injuries to persons, &c., to the amount of £304,376. Surely, sir it is time some action was taken to prevent this great loss of life and property, either by compulsion on the part of the Government or by the directors of the different lines of railway themselves. The public have a right to demand safety for life and property while travelling for business or pleasure.”

In a note at the end the writer said—

“Two years and a half since I offered my plans to a railway company. I was told by one of the directors they had agreed not to countenance anything only what came from their own engineer. I told him then the thing was settled—their engineer must have all the brains in the world; so I bid him good morning. Since I offered my plans, I should think, on the different lines of railway, the property destroyed and compensation paid for persons injured and killed would amount to above £100,000. That would have been prevented if my plans had been applied on the different lines of railway at the time.”

“Yesterday a train took fire on the Midland Railway between Birmingham and Derby. It appears that the body of one of the carriages in the mid-day down train, either through being too heavily freighted or in consequence of defective springs, sank down on the wheels, and the friction set the wood on fire. One of the passengers shouted out of the window, and his cries being heard by the passengers in the adjoining carriages, at length the attention of the guard was attracted. The train was brought to a stand near Tamworth, and the carriage, in which a considerable hole had been burnt, was detached from it. Some luggage belonging to a lady was burning, but the damage done was immaterial.”

Another paper said—

“An accident happened to a passenger train on Thursday evening, on the Cambridge and Hitchin line. The train was travelling at the rate of about twenty-five miles an hour, and, when near Shepreth, one of the carriages got off the line. After bumping along for some minutes it was precipitated down an embankment, and the two following carriages were turned over. The passengers were more or less seriously injured, but we understand no lives were lost. The inhabitants of the village, and especially a kind-hearted lady named Mrs. Ellis, paid every attention to the passengers; and the engine not having gone off the rails, the remaining carriages were enabled to proceed on the journey. It is stated by some of the travellers that if there had been any means of communicating with the driver the train might have been stopped before the embankment was reached.”

With respect to accidents by fire he found that His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales had a narrow escape while travelling by train from the Russian capital to Berlin. The special correspondent of The Daily Telegraph, writing to that journal from Berlin on December 1st, 1866, said—

“Just after it got dark there was an alarm of fire, and it turned out that the Royal carriage was burning. Happily the danger was discovered close to the station of Braunsberg, where the train stopped. Whether a wheel had caught fire, or the pipes with which the carriages were warmed had got overheated, nobody seemed exactly to know. Fortunately, there was no harm done to anybody, but the carriage was so much charred that it was thought unsafe to proceed in it. Some compartments in the ordinary cars were cleared for the Prince and his companions, and after a long hour’s delay we got on again, leaving the saloon carriage still smoking as we passed out of the station.”

Since the Select Committee was appointed on this Bill last year, he had had a conversation with a Member of the House, who had told him that on one occasion when travelling by express train on the Brighton Railway he perceived a strong smell of fire, which proceeded from the door of the carriage. He had no means of communicating with the guard, and by the time the train had arrived at the next station the door was a mass of charred wood. The gentleman who had acted as Secretary to the Select Committee of last year had informed him that he had on one occasion been in a railway carriage the wheels of which came off one after another, letting the body of the carriage down upon the ground, and that it was not until the lives of the passengers had been in serious jeopardy for some considerable time that they succeeded in attracting the attention of the guard. There had been a notice in The Times some time ago of a gentleman having his head cut off by a post when leaning out of the carriage window in endeavouring to attract the attention of the guard. The Times of that morning also contained a letter from a gentleman who had unsuccessfully tried to communicate with the guard, the carriage in which he was being on fire. Thus, it could not be disputed that a case of necessity for communication between the passengers and the guard had been established. With respect to the other objection—namely, that the communication was liable to be interfered with by persons travelling by rail, the best answer which could possibly be given to that objection was derived from the experience gained on the South-Eastern Railway. Mr. Eborall, the manager of that line, had assured him that in no single instance had the means of communication between passengers and guards, established on their line, been interfered with. Under these circumstances, he trusted that the House would agree to read the Bill a second time. He should be happy, when the Bill was in Committee, to consider favourably any Amendments which might be suggested by the Government or the railway interest to any of its provisions. If it were the wish of the House, he should have no objection to exclude the Metropolitan Railway from the operation of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. H. B. Sheridan).

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, he had no objection to this Bill being read a second time; but he reserved to himself the power of opposing it in a future stage, unless the hon. Member made such alterations as seemed to him to be necessary. It would be unadvisable to pass it in its present shape. To require railways to make the necessary arrangements in three months would be requiring them to do what was physically impossible. He should also object to the Board of Trade or its inspector being asked to certify that effectual means had been provided when it was doubtful whether effectual means had yet been discovered. Experiments were being made daily. Men of science and of practical mechanical talent had had their minds directed to this object. It was well known that a really good and perfect plan would be taken up and well rewarded. If the House compelled the railways to adopt at heavy expense one of the present confessedly imperfect means of communication, they would do great mischief by retarding and throwing discouragement in the way of something better. Many people thought that they should not interfere in these matters at all; that they should trust to the heavy penalties and loss inflicted on companies in case of accident; and that Lord Campbell's Act was better than any interference with the details of management. The truth, as usual, probably lay between the two extremes. It was, no doubt, true that the accidents happening to railway travellers were much fewer in proportion than those which occurred under the old coach system. More people were killed in the London streets than on all the railways in the kingdom. It was also true that a very small portion of the accidents which did occur would be prevented by communication between passengers and guards. But it might be said, on the other hand, that the outrages which had sometimes been perpetrated in carriages, and which might have been prevented if such communication had existed, necessitated interference with the preliminary arrangements of a journey, because, while they entailed great injury on individuals, they caused little or no loss to the company. Then, the question arose whether any effectual means had been discovered for carrying into effect the provisions of this Bill. An excellent Report of Captain Tyler to the Board of Trade, made the year before last, went very fully into the question. It showed the endeavours made in England and on the Continent to prevent the helpless isolation of passengers by communication through signals, or by the construction of the carriages. With regard to the latter the ordinary contrivance on the Continent was the outside step. This was very dangerous, sacrificing, as appeared from Belgian accounts, the lives of guards every year. It was also supposed to give facilities both for outrage and escape, as in the case of the murder of M. Poinso in France a year or two back. It was, besides, impossible to apply it in England without altering the width of carriages and of tunnels and bridges throughout the country, the expense of which would be very great. He had travelled by railway in most of the countries in Europe and in America; but he did not share in the condemnation sometimes pronounced on the English carriages. The American carriages were suited, no doubt, to the plan of one class without distinction. The Austrian were an improvement on the American, but almost equally wanting in the privacy demanded by English feeling in this country; and they were excessively cold in winter. The Russian carriages with a passage in the middle, cabins on each side, saloons at each end, and other conveniences for a long journey, and with four means of exit, were very good, probably the best of all, but they were too wide for our gauge, and too long for our curves. The Swiss, with three classes in one carriage, and communication from higher to lower, but not the reverse, were also good, and the guard could walk through them. But the great objection to all, or almost all he had described, was the dangerous exit at the end. In a crowded carriage, if there was a panic, it would be as difficult to get out as in a church or theatre. Then came the means of communication by signal. The earliest probably was the bell and rope. Travellers by the Great Northern if a little before their time might have seen a cord threaded from carriage to carriage low down under the footboard. This rang a bell in the guard box and the engine. But he remembered a Member of that House telling him that he found himself once in a carriage with one other passenger, whose conduct, after a time, began to excite his apprehension. He seemed very uneasy, looked out, listened, and stretched out of the window till his informant thought he was going to throw himself out, and came to the conclusion that he was shut up with a madman. His uneasiness increased when his fellow traveller, after leaning out further than ever, turned to him and said, "Have you any objection, Sir, to take hold of my leg?" But he proceeded to explain that he was an engineer, and that from a sound he heard he thought something was wrong with the axle, and wished to get at the rope in order to stop the train, which, with the assistance of his companion, he did. He mentioned this to show that it was evident that such a contrivance could hardly be called effectual, especially with regard to the use of it by a lady. Then came the reversed sentry-box of the Great Western, the mirrors of the Cete Railway, and the bells and whistles of the Dutch and German lines. It was clear that these must often fail in tunnels, in fogs, in the night, and where there was much rattle in the train. They were condemned by the French Commission in one brief sentence, "The sight signals cannot be seen, and the sound signals cannot be heard." The best signal seemed to be the electric, used on the South Western and on some of the French railways, which rang bells in the guards' vans and engines, and dropped a semaphore to the side of the carriage in which the signal was given. The hon. Member had also mentioned with approbation that used on the South Eastern. But, as the guard could not on many lines, at least, reach the carriages, the only plan was to stop the train, which must necessarily be done with great caution on lines like ours, on which trains follow each other so rapidly. This safeguard was on the lines to which he had referred combined with windows between the compartments. To this objection was sometimes taken by those who wished to have the security of publicity without its inconvenience. He was afraid this must be classed with the inconsistent advantages at which all aimed, but which none were destined to reach. It was absolutely necessary that any wanton tampering with these signals should be severely punished, but he was not quite sure that this would be sufficient. Some fine should be inflicted on causeless alarm, otherwise great inconvenience might ensue. He remembered seeing a farce in Paris a short time ago, in which a nervous lady was represented as finding herself several times during a journey alone with one of the other sex. Each of the unhappy men in his turn made some polite advances, on which she immediately broke the glass, and pressed the spring. The train came to a standstill. The guard appeared; she explained her alarm. "Madame, le motif n'était pas suffisant; c'est cinquante francs s'il vous plait!" This method of signalling was computed to cost £10 a mile, and 10 per cent on outlay for maintenance. It would, of course, be absurd to require that it should be used for trains stopping at short intervals. He believed directors would not be unwilling to do all they could for the safety of passengers. It was certainly to their interest to do so, and they themselves travelled as much, if not more, than other people. When he heard the terms in which they were sometimes spoken of in that House, he was inclined to ask, parodying Shylock, "Hath not a director organs, senses, passions, hurt by the same means, subject to the same accidents as a Christian?" At the same time they required, like most other people, a little wholesome pressure, and when it was remembered that it was exactly twenty years ago, in 1847, that the first circular on this subject was issued to the companies, legislation could hardly be called precipitate. The Railway Commission would report at the end of the week; and therefore he thought that the hon. Member should put off his Committee till the House had had the opportunity of considering how far his Bill could be made to square with the recommendations of that Report. He had made these remarks in consequence of the Bill not having been discussed at all last Session, and on the understanding he had mentioned he would not oppose its second reading.

TURNPIKE TRUSTS BILL—[BILL 80.]
(Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen, Mr. George Clive, Mr. Ayrton, Mr. Goldney.)

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen.)

MR. WALPOLE said, he had no objection to the Bill being read a second time, on the understanding that it would be referred to a Select Committee. It would, perhaps, be convenient if he were to refer to one or two points, to which the attention of the Select Committee should be especially directed. The Bill which purported to alter and amend the law relating to turnpike trusts, was really intended to effect the abolition of tolls. He wished to call attention to the three parts of the Bill. The first provided that where there was no debt remaining and the trust had expired, it should be discontinued at the end of a year. The second, that in cases where the trusts had expired but debts remained, provision should be made for extinguishing such debts. The third, and most important, related to the rate-in-aid, where the trust had expired, and where the charge thrown upon the parishes through which the road passed was deemed by the justices of the peace in quarter session to be unduly augmented. Upon the first he was not in a position to arrive at any conclusion as to whether or not the House would think it desirable that the trusts therein referred to should expire within the year, irrespective of all local circumstances. There were many matters that would have to be inquired into by the Select Committee before they could advise the House to accept one iron-bound rule to be applied in all cases. The second portion of the Bill also appeared to be open to objection. He did not see that any provision had been made to meet the case of the Secretary for State not approving the arrangements that had been entered into for the extinction of the debt. Also, if the tolls were to be applied solely in extinguishing the debt the duty thrown upon the parishes of repairing the roads would be badly performed. The third portion would require very careful consideration, as it involved the most important principle in the Bill. The Bill proposed to enact—

"In all cases where it shall be made apparent by the local authorities to justices of the peace in Quarter Sessions that the rates of any of the several parishes or highway districts have been unduly and disproportionately augmented in carrying out the provisions of this Act, it shall be lawful for such justices to contribute any funds out of the county rates already assessed or to be hereafter assessed for the purpose of aiding and assisting any of such parishes or highway districts which, in pursuance of any order under the hand of the said Secretary of State, has been directed to be assessed by the said local authorities for the purpose of maintaining and keeping in repair the portion of the turnpike road which passes through any such parish or highway district, according to the provisions hereinbefore contained, and such contribution shall be apportioned by the said justices between and amongst any such parishes or highway districts in such manner as they may deem expedient."

That was a very important provision. It was an attempt to meet that which had always been a difficulty in every proposal for discontinuing turnpike trusts by what he had called the rate-in-aid, that was by extending the area of rating. But what was to guide the justices in determining whether there had been an undue and disproportionate augmentation of the charge? That charge might vary from 1*d.* to nearly 2*s.* in the pound in different parishes. He threw out these observations for the purpose of drawing attention to the points which the Select Committee would have to consider. The Select Committee should have all the necessary powers to enable them to fully investigate the matter. He should not object to the second reading of the Bill provided it was clearly understood that it was to go before a Select Committee.

MR. WHALLEY said, that the object of the measure was to meet the difficulties which existed by giving to the Home Secretary on the one hand, and to the magistrates on the other, power to deal with the local circumstances out of which difficulties arose. He desired to express his obligations to the hon. Member who had brought forward this Bill in fulfilment of a pledge of the late Government upon the occasion, when he (Mr. Whalley) brought forward one of a similar nature. The matter was ripe for decision, after the evidence which had been taken by the Committee which had sat upon the subject. The Bill carried out a desirable object much more effectually than the Bill he had himself been allowed to introduce. The sound, original, and constitutional principle was, that the roads should be maintained by local property; but within a brief legal memory these turnpike trusts were sanctioned by Parliament on a false pretence of improvements, and the public was made to pay not only for improvements but for the maintenance of the roads, the onus of providing for which of right lay with the property of each district. This was a grievous injustice inflicted upon the public, and all the objections urged against the Bill rested upon a desire to perpetuate the wrong.

MR. KNIGHT said, that abolishing the turnpikes would be a great boon to the public; but he did not agree that this charge should be entirely thrown upon real property. These roads were, no doubt, for the good of the land; but generally they were made in an agricultural district lying between two great centres of trade. They were not generally in the position of parish roads, and they cost four or five times as much as the parish roads to keep them up. If the Bill passed in its present shape it would throw a grievous burden upon the holders of one description of property. Nothing could be fairer than that those who used the roads should pay for them. If the expense of the turnpike roads were thrown upon the parishes there would be great discontent excited throughout the country. A part of the expense should be placed upon the Consolidated Fund, as had been done in reference to the police and the poor, and for the same reason—namely, that the object to be obtained was for the benefit of the whole country. He hoped that when the Bill was returned from the Select Committee there would be provisions for placing part of the expense upon the general public instead of its being all placed upon real property.

LORD HENLEY said, that as a Member of the Select Committee of 1864, he had been much struck by the local circumstances detailed before that Committee, and believed that, but for those local circumstances, legislation would long since have been attempted. Indeed, the difficulties of this kind were so great that he hardly knew how the Select Committee would deal with them. In 1863 the Metropolitan Turnpike Roads Act threw seventy miles of roads on to what were principally suburban parishes, and there was great opposition. But these suburban parishes had not a leg to stand on, their vicinity to the metropolis, from which the traffic came, benefiting them to an extent much more than proportionate. But there were cases in which, though the burdens might increase, the benefits failed to do so. Districts, for instance, where the land through which the road passed remained agricultural in its character, though there might be a large town at either extremity of the road. Then there were cases where there were mines, the immense traffic from which cut up the roads very much, whilst many paid no rates at all. Others only paid upon the royalty, which was nothing like what a rate upon the produce of the mine would be. Lead and iron mines did not pay any rates, so that, unless they were actually levied on the carts containing the heavy material, they escaped altogether. In the case of coals no amount was ever levied by a rate upon the estimated yield of a colliery corresponding to that paid in actual turnpike tolls. The rate was charged on a royalty payable to the owner of the mine. Probably £70 a year might be produced by a rate, where the tolls or carriage of the coals before had yielded £300 or £400. Pleasure traffic, to such places as the Peak in Derbyshire, used the roads very largely, and yet would not pay a single farthing in the shape of rates towards their repair. Except, probably, for their hotel bills, the excursionists, if there were no tolls, would escape scot free. There were many local circumstances of this nature, forming a great variety of separate cases, which he did not believe could be lumped with advantage, and dealt with off-hand in one sweeping general Act. As to the case of parishes which were to contribute to the amount of the debt, he understood the Secretary of State was to allocate the debt upon the different parishes through which the road went. This might answer in counties where there were highway boards; but parishes which were not in any highway district would be placed in very great difficulty, and would have good ground to complain of the burden which would be put upon them. The debt would have been incurred without their advice or consent. Perhaps it had been incurred unwisely, or there had been no prudence used in paying it off. Then it was said that there might be a rate in aid for these parishes; but he did not think it right that they should be thrown upon such a precarious resource. They would be thrown upon the mercy of quarter sessions, and there would be great opposition to a rate-in-aid in support of particular parishes. These were points to which he thought that the Committee should attend.

MR. HENLEY said that the first thing that struck him was, that it was something new to refer a mass of debt amounting to many millions to the arbitrary decision of the Secretary of State, and particularly so when they considered how some of the debt had been incurred. The Bill would summarily deprive parties of the power which they had hitherto possessed of coming to Parliament and making out a case, if circumstances rendered that feasible, for the renewal of their security. There were certain provisions according to which the trustees were to arrange the value of these securities. Then the matter was for the approbation of the Secretary of State, whose duty would not be very agreeable. He knew of no instance in which a similar course of proceeding had been adopted in reference to so large a property. Nothing could work better than the present mode of winding up these trusts. The circumstances of the different turnpike trusts were so various that he doubted very much the possibility of making a general law that would work well for the whole of them. It was proposed that under certain circumstances the county rate should be called in aid. The counties would thus be called upon to pay by rates monies over the application of which they would have no control. He feared also that this Bill would destroy the state and good quality of the turnpike roads. No one could doubt that the turnpike roads were, as a rule, in a better condition than the parish roads. He did not know what security they could have that the parishes would keep the turnpike roads in a better condition than they kept the parish roads. Parishes were not fond of spending more money than they could help, and as long as they kept clear of indictments they would be satisfied. Anything in the way of improvement, such as cutting down hills, would come to an untimely end. As to the debt, much of it had been incurred for the purpose of making improvements, and to keep them in repair for the sake of the through traffic; and his experience was that the through traffic never paid for the roads, large as the tolls were. The Bill, in its present state, was very objectionable.

MR. GOLDNEY said, that if it had not been for the local circumstances which had been referred to, turnpikes would have been swept away long ago. As a general rule, the amount of taxation imposed in the shape of tolls on parties living in the neighbourhood of roads for their maintenance was in excess of that which they would have to pay if the whole of the expense were levied in the shape of rates off the different parishes. There were about 22,000 miles of turnpike road, and there were upwards of 7,700 houses for the collection of tolls. The average cost of repair for these roads for a long series of years had been £51 per mile, and in addition to this there were the expenses of collection and the profit to the lessees of the tolls. These two sources of expense together amounted to a sum of very nearly £400,000, and this sum the public paid in excess of the real cost of repair. This added expenditure brought the average cost of repairing turnpike roads up to £70 per mile; the cost of parish roads being, some years ago, as low as £11 per mile. Practically, the through traffic had now been absorbed by the railways, and if residents along the roads would calculate, as a friend of his had done, what they actually paid now in the shape of tolls, as compared with what they would have to pay hereafter in the shape of rates, they would probably find that a saving would be realized by the latter method of collection. The expense of a double set of surveyors and management would be saved when there was no longer two systems of road management in existence. As to the apprehensions excited by the proposal to intrust the Secretary of State with these powers, it must be remembered that for a long series of years the Secretary of State had exercised powers of a precisely similar character, whenever parties applied for a renewal of Turnpike Acts. The result of the Bill would be that the highway Boards would have the power of limiting the expenses of the repair of the bye roads when the main roads were open to the public free. He knew that there might be some difficulty in the carrying out of this measure, but was fully convinced that the time had come for abolishing the present turnpike system altogether, and under those circumstances he should support the Bill.

MR. BEACH said, he could scarcely see how this Bill could be carried out without inflicting injustice on certain classes of the community. It was founded upon the Report and recommendation of the Select Committee of 1864. The witnesses that were examined before that Committee, however, in almost every case came there with but one notion—namely, to get rid, if possible, of the present turnpike system. Some of them volunteered to give evidence in order to detail their own exceptional grievances. When it was proposed to make such a sweeping change as that of shifting the burden of those rates from the shoulders that at present bore it to the various parishes throughout the country, he thought it was only fair that the evidence of witnesses from the classes that were to bear the burden in future should be taken. Within the last few years the debt had been reduced from £7,000,000 to about £4,000,000, and judging from that fact there was every reason to suppose that in a few years more the whole debt would be entirely wiped out. No one could doubt that a considerable saving in the management of roads would take place if these trusts were abolished; but the burden on the locality would be increased. The only question was, whether the Consolidated Fund should not be called upon to assist in paying off the debts. At present the broad principle was carried out that those who used the roads paid for them. If those who came from a distance contributed nothing to the maintenance of the roads it would operate as a great hardship in many instances. A timber dealer who gave evidence before the Select Committee stated that he kept eight or nine horses in constant work; but that if tolls were abolished he would only pay a rate on £25 a year, the annual value of his house. If, however, on the contrary, as was contended, the roads were simply used for local purposes, why should those who were anxious to change the law in their own case interfere with those who desire for the present to maintain it. As to the suggestion that an appeal to the quarter sessions would be a security against a grievance inflicted, it was his opinion that the quarter sessions would not be inclined to interfere at all in the matter. He hoped that the Select Committee to which the Bill was to be referred would take into their consideration the case of those trusts that were really progressing in a favourable manner, as it appeared to be most undesirable to deal with such in the summary way in which the Bill proposed to treat them. Let representatives from the different trusts give their views, and the Committee would be able to deal in a fairer manner with the variety of their interests.

MR. G. CLIVE said, that the owners of property and not the Consolidated Fund ought to bear the burden of the debt. The roads had been made, for the most part, for the benefit of the owners of property, and they ought to pay the debt where debt existed. As Chairman of the Committee of 1864, he could assure the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Beach) that he was mistaken in supposing that there were no witnesses called or examined but such as were favourable to the proposed change of the system. There were several gentlemen examined who were decidedly favourable to the existing law. The evidence, however, as well as the recommendations of the Committee, had effected a marvellous change in the opinions of many who had hitherto supported the existing system. He rejoiced that the dear old fallacy about those who used the road paying for the road had intruded so little into the discussion. As regarded the carriage of timber, minerals, and other heavy substances, special provisions must, of course, be introduced on that head. If the Committee by which the Bill would be considered were a good one, as he had no doubt it would be, he had great hopes that the Bill would be worked into a good shape.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, that there was a general prevalence of opinion that some alteration should be made in the law relating to turnpike trusts. He approved many of the Bill's provisions; and hoped that the labour undertaken by the introducer would result in substantial benefit to the country. He particularly approved of that part of the Bill which recognised the hardship inflicted on some parishes by the abolition of the trusts. He hoped that the principle laid down in respect to that would be carried further. But he had several objections to the Bill as it stood. If, for instance, the cost of maintaining the roads were thrown upon the rates, the tax would weigh heavily upon some descriptions of property and lightly upon others. Some alteration was absolutely necessary in the present basis of rating, and also in the area of taxation, before a rate for mending roads could be fairly levied. And if, as the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Henley) had recommended, the court of quarter sessions should have power to make a rate, it should also be given extraordinary power enabling it to insure that the rate was properly applied. He should like to see clauses introduced making highway districts compulsory throughout the country. In this matter the example of South Wales should be followed. In each of the six counties of South Wales there was a head county Board. In England a similar Board might be constituted with power to disburse money, and also to appoint a chief surveyor to superintend the operations of highway surveyors throughout the country. At present the surveying department was ill-attended to. Either the district was small, and presided over by an incompetent man, at a low salary, or else the district was too large for the surveyor properly to do his duty. He objected to the way in which the Bill proposed to deal with trusts whose debts had been liquidated. The proposal was that those trusts which had paid off their particular debts should cease in 1868, but that the remainder should continue on for ten years longer, or until they had paid off their debts. Now, the practical result of such an arrangement would be that the public, who were generally disposed to go even a round in order to avoid the tolls, would favour those roads in which they had been removed, and would thus create a greater burden upon the ratepayers of particular parishes than they had hitherto borne. It was his opinion that all the trusts should be kept up until the whole debt was paid off. At a recent meeting of the Central Chamber of Agriculture, at which he was present, two resolutions were passed. The one was to the effect that the turnpike trusts should be abolished simultaneously. The other was, that inasmuch as a portion of the expenditure for the turnpike roads had been incurred for Imperial purposes, the Consolidated Fund ought to aid in the payment of the debt. In France the main roads were maintained out of the Imperial revenue, and much public money had been spent in Scotland in making roads; but it was only in very rare instances that the State had contributed to the making of roads in England. He asked whether, as the credit of the country was applied on behalf of bankrupt Irish railways, it should not in equal justice be applied in behalf of bankrupt English roads. ["No!"] Of course, Irish Members would say "No!" He trusted that the Bill would be sent before a Select Committee and there improved.

COLONEL FRENCH said, that having served on the Committee of 1864, what struck him most was the injurious treatment which the ratepayers had received under the present system and the extraordinary system that was kept up in order to favour the mortgagees. He believed there was scarcely a single debt hanging over the turnpike trusts that was perfectly legal. The Acts in respect to the debts which were paid off had all expired, and the Acts relating to those which were not paid off had also expired; but the tolls were kept up by continuous Bills introduced year by year by the Home Department. In the case of the debts which had not been paid off, there was really no legal claim, because the conditions upon which the money was advanced had not been fulfilled. He strongly objected to the continuance of a system which placed a double charge upon the ratepayers of the country, and he should support the present Bill, believing that some advantage would arise from it.

Mr. G. Clive

LORD GEORGE CAVENDISH said, he thought that they might with advantage go to Scotland for some hints as to the future management of the turnpike roads. Although the Bill introduced by the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) and the subsequent measure of the Lord Advocate in respect to the turnpike system of Scotland had failed to pass into a law, Scotchmen, with that shrewdness and sagacity which characterized them, proceeded to introduce Bills for their several counties, and thus with great prudence and judgment managed to get rid of their tolls. He was quite in favour of an alteration in the law of this country. One great evil in existence was the expense attending the renewal of those turnpike trusts. He believed that every measure introduced for the renewal of a trust, though unopposed, cost about £500 or £600, which money was taken from the pockets of the public. He should be glad to see an improvement of this system. He hoped his hon. Friend would be able so to improve his measure by the aid of the Select Committee that it would pass with ease.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, that having made a very full statement upon the introduction of the Bill, he should not have troubled the House but for some objections which had been raised during the course of the debate. His hon. Friend the Member for North Hants (Mr. Beach) had stated that the Bill was founded upon the Report of the Select Committee of 1864. He (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) begged to say that, although he was grateful for the assistance which he had derived from that Report, the Bill was founded upon long and earnest consideration of the question; upon some little practical knowledge of the working of the turnpike system; and upon the sincere belief which he entertained that the time had arrived when the question might receive a satisfactory solution. His right hon. Friend the Home Secretary had mentioned several points to which he would refer. And first with respect to the case in which the Secretary of State might not approve of the provisional arrangement made between the trustees and the mortgagees, the right hon. Gentleman had said that no provision was made as to what should be done. He (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) was obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for pointing out that which might possibly be an omission in the Bill. The intention certainly was, that when no arrangement could be made which the Secretary of State approved, he should then proceed upon his own authority—inquire, by means of the ample machinery at his command, into the value of the debt and circumstances of the trust, and make his order accordingly. Then the right hon. Gentleman had spoken of the tolls maintained for a certain time by order of the Secretary of State as if they were only to be applicable to the payment of establishment charges and debt. But a reference to the latter part of Clause 5 would show that the surplus of such tolls was to be applicable to the repairs of the roads within the parishes and districts; and when it was said that the ratepayers were going to have the responsibility of a large amount of debt thrown upon them, he must observe that this was only a nominal responsibility. Let it be remembered that the ratepayers and the tollpayers either were or were not identical. If, as was sometimes contended by the opponents of turnpike abolition, they were not identical, then, during the maintenance of the tolls, the ratepayers would be receiving extraneous assistance towards the discharge of the debt. If, on the other hand, they were identical, the ratepayers would be no worse off than at present. They would have, as at present, to pay the interest of the debt; and any temporary increase of their rates would be in a great measure met by the economy in the management and collection of tolls which, having the matter for the first time under their own control, they would be able to effect. His noble Friend behind him (Lord Henley) had made two objections to which he must refer. One related to the fact that lead mines and some other mines not being rated, and the traffic from them being considerable, the effect of toll abolition in the mining districts would be very injurious to the neighbouring parishes. He would, however, remind his noble Friend (in addition to arguments which he had formerly advanced with reference to the advantages which the existence of mines and similar properties conferred upon a neighbourhood) that this very question of the rating of mines was at this moment under the consideration of a Select Committee, and that the objection was therefore in a fair way to be obviated. The other objection of his noble Friend was made upon the supposition that in some cases the debt would remain and be left upon the parishes after the tolls had ceased to be collected under the order of the Secretary of State. This, however, was a misapprehension of the object and scope of the Bill. It was intended that the Secretary of State should fix the period during which tolls should be collected, after a full investigation of the circumstances in each case. By this investigation he would be guided as to the time which he should fix for the duration of the tolls; and in the great majority of cases the market value of the debt would be paid off before the limit fixed beyond which toll collection might not be extended—namely, 1878. In all cases the debt would cease simultaneously with the collection of tolls. With regard to the observations of the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley), whilst tendering his thanks to hon. Gentlemen generally for the manner in which they had received his Bill, he felt bound to express his acknowledgments especially to that hon. Gentleman, who had himself introduced more than one Bill upon the same subject and had some claim to deal with it, having conferred good service by calling public attention to the question. He had, however, forborne to press any such claim, or to propose a rival scheme, and agreeing in the main principle of his (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen's) Bill, had given it a cordial and hearty support. The hon. Member for Worcestershire (Mr. Knight) had complained of the grievous burden which would be inflicted upon parishes not forming part of a highway district. But he (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) would beg to remind the hon. Gentleman that this burden was now inflicted upon the abolition of a trust, and that such abolition practically depended upon the arbitrary will of the Home Secretary, because although the approval of Parliament was formally required, yet the Turnpike Continuance Bills which dealt with this matter were of necessity introduced so late in the Session, that Government had practically always a majority, and an attempt to continue or discontinue any particular trust when the opinion of the locality had been opposed to the decision of the Secretary of State, was almost hopeless. So much was this felt to be the case that he (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) had only that very morning received a request that he would move to refer to a Select Committee the Turnpike Continuance Bill of the present Session, wherein it was believed the present Home Secretary had, to a considerable extent, reversed the decisions of his predecessor. He (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) was most unwilling to do anything of the kind which might be hostile to the right hon. Gentleman; but he mentioned the fact to show the complaints which existed. It was clear that the "grievous burden" upon parishes existed now. The Bill would not alter their common law liability, but it would deal more fairly and more equally with them than was at present the case. Then the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire said that this Bill would adopt a new principle in referring a large debt to the arbitrary decision of the Secretary of State. Again, he must remind the House that this was precisely the case under the present law upon the termination of a trust, and the only object of the Bill in this respect was to expedite and equalize the action of the Secretary of State, who now had the power to extinguish debt and reduce interest, but who would be obliged to act in certain cases instead of continuing Trust Acts annually and only abolishing them at his discretion. The right hon. Gentleman had also doubted the possibility of making one general law upon the subject. He (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) had by no means shut his eyes to the complications and difficulties of the subject. They would, however, be lessened by the adoption of the measure before the House, and the state of things be rendered less unequal than under the existing system. He (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) entirely agreed with the views of the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), that the true solution of the question was the universal adoption of the Highway Act, and the placing all roads, turnpike and highway, upon the common fund of the highway districts. But in all legislation it was necessary not to ask always for the whole extent of your requirements if you found you could better obtain what you wanted by degrees. He must notice one omission in the speech of the Home Secretary, who, he had hoped, would have followed up his suggestion upon the introduction of the Bill, by announcing an Instruction to the Committee that they should have power to deal with the Highway Act, so as to make its adoption compulsory if they should think fit. He (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) should be ready to move such an Instruction himself, if he had any indication of the opinion of the House being favourable to such a course. With respect to the suggestion of the Home Secretary that evidence should be taken before the Select Committee, he could, of course, only yield a ready assent to such a wish expressed by a Gentleman in the position of the Home Secretary. He hoped, however, that the right hon. Gentleman would agree with him that it would be inexpedient to re-open the whole question of the toll system, upon which there already existed for reference a mass of evidence taken before the two Select Committees which had previously sat upon the subject, but that the evidence taken should be restricted to particular points connected with the working of the proposed measure. In this view, and with the understanding, clear and certain, that the principle of the desirability of abolishing turnpike tolls was admitted by the House and by the Government, he would go into the Select Committee prepared to receive every suggestion for amendment in the most conciliatory spirit, and with the sole desire that the Bill might come forth from the labours of the Committee in a form which might offer to the House and to the country a satisfactory settlement of the question.

Bill read a second time, and committed to a Select Committee.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. GRAVES said, that in rising to move that the Order of the Day for the second reading of this Bill be read and discharged, he wished to offer a few remarks to the House to explain his reasons for taking that course. When he gave notice of his intention to introduce the Bill, Mr. Speaker expressed some doubts as to the propriety of a private Member introducing a measure affecting the revenue of the country. By a technical alteration of the Notice of Motion and by the permission of the Government he was allowed to bring in his Bill, in order that the subject might be ventilated. Within the last few days it had been intimated to him that Her Majesty's Government considered it would be their duty to oppose the further progress of the Bill, as it proposed to deal largely with the taxation of the country, and in consequence the promoters of the Bill had no alternative but to defer to the wish of the Government and ask the permission of the House to withdraw the Bill. The Bill, whatever might be its merits or its demerits, was at least a well-meant effort to deal honestly with the question. It was now unnecessary for him to detain the House in adverting to the principles of the Bill, which were intended to deal in a just and comprehensive manner with the question. The present unsatisfactory state of the law was thoroughly and fully admitted. Nothing more was wanted to make that conviction clear than to refer to the petition which he had just presented, signed by 82,000 of the inhabitants of one town (Liverpool). It was true the immediate purpose of this monster petition was not gained; but the trouble would not be thrown away, for its moral weight remained, and such an expression of public opinion could scarcely fail to strengthen, if not hasten, legislation upon the subject. The difficulty that existed in dealing with this question by a private Member, and the experience he had gained with regard to the conduct of such a measure through the House, had led him to the conclusion that in a matter affecting so largely the well-being of the community as well as the large interests that were engaged in the trade, the only chance of successful legislation was by its being dealt with by the Government. He was therefore happy in being able to state that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole) had adopted that view of the question, and had given him the assurance that he would endeavour to deal with the subject by the introduction of a measure next Session. He received that assurance with the greatest satisfaction; and he would in consequence leave the matter in the hands of the Government, with perfect confidence that they would take it up and grapple with it in a most efficient and satisfactory manner. He regretted the right hon. Gentleman was not then in his place, because it was his intention to have asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he had rightly conveyed the intentions of Her Majesty's Government on the subject to the House. He believed he had done so, and he might add that that determination of Her Majesty's Government had greatly aided him in coming to the conclusion that it would be better to withdraw the Bill.

Moved, "That the Order for the second reading of the Bill be withdrawn and discharged."—(Mr. Graves.)

MR. A. SMITH said, he considered the hon. Gentleman had acted very wisely in withdrawing the Bill under the assurance that Her Majesty's Government would take up the subject next Session. It was the only course likely to be conducive of a satisfactory settlement of the great and important question of licensing. He certainly regretted the Home Secretary was not in his place to confirm the statement made by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Graves). At the same time he (Mr. Smith) had no doubt of its accuracy, and that the Government would give its attention to this important subject. The settlement of the question was one of the greatest importance to the social and religious interests of the country. He believed that no question was in a more unsatisfactory state at present than the licensing system. He congratulated the country on the fact that it would receive the early attention of the Government with a view to its improvement.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he regretted the accidental circumstances which had prevented the Home Secretary from being in his place. He hoped some hon. Member, or his hon. Friend (Mr. Graves), would ask a question of the Home Secretary respecting his intentions, so that they should hear from the Treasury Bench the course which the Government exactly intended to pursue. He had no doubt that his hon. Friend was right in his impressions, and that the right hon. Gentleman had made up his mind to bring forward a measure next Session to settle the licensing question; but it was not unreasonable that they should wish to have the statement confirmed from the Treasury Bench, considering the great importance of the subject. The position in which the House of Commons stood in regard to the licensing question was not satisfactory. It was acknowledged by men of all parties, and by Governments of all parties, that the licensing system was the cause of much evil; yet there seemed to be a reluctance to settle—or a fear of attempting to settle—the question. He did not think that that tended to the honour either of the House of Commons or of the Government. He did not intend to question the policy of the hon. Gentleman in not pressing the Bill, though he thought it would be desirable to have a discussion upon it. There was much in the Bill of which he (Mr. W. E. Forster) did not approve, but there was one great principle in it—namely, that all houses for the sale of intoxicating liquors should be put under one licensing power—that of the magistrates.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE was anxious to explain, after what had passed, that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department had been summoned to the Cabinet, and that his absence did not arise from a desire to avoid answering any question, or from a failure to recognise the importance of the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Liverpool. No man entertained a deeper sense of the importance of this subject than his right hon. Friend, and he had already promised to give it his most careful consideration. He (Mr. Cave) thought the hon. Member had exercised a wise discretion in taking the course he had done. It would not, of course, be proper for him to enter further into the question. There were some parts of the Bill to which he might take exception; but he concurred with the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) in approving of that provision which placed the whole licensing system under one control—namely, that of the justices.

MR. HADFIELD said, he concurred in opinion that it would be highly satisfactory to the public to have an assurance from the Home Secretary that Her Majesty's Government would introduce a measure upon this subject next Session. There was a desire throughout the country that it should be settled as speedily as possible. It was admitted by all that there was an evil which required a remedy.

MR. HORSFALL said, he fully agreed in the propriety of the course which his hon. Friend (Mr. Graves) had adopted. He was himself satisfied with the statement which had been made by his hon. Colleague, and those who wished to have it confirmed by the Home Secretary were the best persons to put the question to him. It was on that assurance, in which he placed implicit faith, that he concurred with his hon. Colleague in the propriety of withdrawing the Bill. After the many unsuccessful attempts to legislate locally upon the question, he was much gratified to find that Her Majesty's Government intended to deal with it. He was convinced that no measure could be carried through the House and meet the approval of the country, unless introduced on the responsibility of the Government. He had some personal experience on this subject, for in 1863 he had, in conjunction with his late Colleague, introduced a measure which it was intended to confine to Liverpool. It was then urged against the Bill that it attempted to deal locally with what was in reality a national question, and it was thrown out by 16 votes. Tempted by the smallness of the majority, the Bill was subsequently re-introduced, but so decided was the expression of opinion in the House that it was withdrawn, without taking a division upon it. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary was the proper authority to bring in a Bill upon this subject, and so strong was the feeling of the country in reference to the question that the right hon. Gentleman would, he believed, find no difficulty in passing his measure.

PROMISSORY NOTES (IRELAND) BILL.

(Mr. M'Kenna, Mr. Brady.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. M'KENNA, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, it was intended to amend the Act 9 Geo. IV. c. 81, and to authorize banks of issue in Ireland to make their notes payable only at the places in Ireland at which the account of gold and silver coin held by such bankers is taken by the Commissioners of Stamps and Taxes, whenever such notes are in excess of the average amount of circulation during the year preceding May 1, 1845, and are issuable only against gold or silver coin of an equal amount deposited at such places. In doing so he said—I deem it right at this stage to explain to the House that the Bill which I ask the House to read a second time is not identical in any respect with the measure introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Clare last Session, although if it passes into law it will effect much of the good which my hon. Friend proposed to effect by his Bill. As all measures proposing to deal with or affect the currency laws in any portion of the United Kingdom are naturally and properly regarded with a very jealous eye, it is right that I should at the outset inform the House that this Bill is in perfect harmony with the principles which are the basis of our present currency laws. In fact, I only seek for a modification of the technical portions of the existing laws, or if I may be allowed to use the figure, I only seek to adjust and simplify the machinery. But, Sir, it may be asked if the scope of this Bill be so simple, why should the House deal with it as a separate and distinct piece of legislation? and why should we not allow mere technical obstructions which have existed so long to continue somewhat longer, until the amendment is carried out as a portion of a general adjustment? Sir, I anticipate these objections at once by saying that the subject is important, and pressed for early rectification, and the Bill I ask the House to pass will not complicate, but, if passed, will materially simplify the existing law. As I have said that the subject is urgent, it is right that I should exemplify and prove the grievance I seek to redress. Another reason, however, which strongly presses on my mind the absolute necessity of altering and amending the law is the fact that it is habitually violated. The Bank of Ireland have offices open on special days in the week at Arklow, Bagnalstown, Cahir, Castlebar, and Monastereven, and at each of these places, on at least one day in the week, this law is openly violated. The penalties which the Bank of Ireland incur by doing business at these places, and issuing their notes there, none of them being payable at any of these places, is of an amount I am afraid to compute. Now I want to alter the law, and submit 9 Geo. IV. to a Committee of this House, which can very easily provide to relax the law so as to legalize the transactions of the Bank of Ireland at these places. If this be not done, then I say let the law be enforced; but, at any rate, let not this House sanction the principle that a law is to remain on the statute books to be a public obstacle to business to all who are prepared to obey the law, and an open scandal, because it is habitually violated with impunity. I believe if the law respecting bank notes were altered according to the principle of this Bill, the Irish community would enjoy the benefit of banking facilities for one or two days in the week in about 150 towns now wholly without such accommodation. I will not weary the House with a list of the towns; but in the letter A of the post towns alone you will find such towns as Abbeyfeale, Adare, Ahascragh, Ardrahan, Arklow, Ashford, Askeaton, Athboy, Athenry, and Aughrim, in every one of which an office might be profitably open if for only one or two days in the week. I will not needlessly occupy time by going through forms of argument to establish principles which the House already recognises. I will save time by saying that I assume it is the desire of the House to afford to Irish industry and enterprise, as also to Irish capital, all the facilities for development and exercise in Ireland which the law can properly concede. I will not trespass upon the indulgence of the House, arguing that the House should so desire, but I assume that the desire exists, and on it I base my hopes that the facts I propose to adduce will be deemed sufficient to induce the House to sanction the present Bill. The fact which I will prove is, that under the present laws affecting the issue of bank notes in Ireland it is more profitable for the majority of Irish issuing bankers to engage their surplus capital out of Ireland than within it. For instance, it is the fact that for five of the six issuing banks in Ireland under the present laws it would be more profitable for them to employ their money in English or foreign securities at a rate of 5 per cent per annum, than to advance to Irish traders on equally good security at 6 per cent. I will explain how this is the case. By the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 37 (Sir Robert Peel's Irish Banking Act, which I do not propose in the least degree to disturb) the amount of notes which an issuing banker in Ireland can maintain in circulation (except notes issued against specie at depôts) is limited to the average amount of his circulation for the year preceding May 1, 1845. The banker, however, by another Act of Parliament, being subject to the payment of a circulation duty equal to 7s. per cent per annum on the total of his notes in circulation, actually pays a duty on the notes which he is obliged to equipoise pound for pound with gold or silver coin at depôts. This is not all, however, nor is it the grievance which this Bill proposes to deal with. By the Act of 9 Geo. IV. c. 81, which I seek to amend, the Irish banker is compelled to make his notes payable at the place where issued. So it comes to pass, by the action of three Acts of Parliament, that the Irish banker who exceeds the amount of his certified circulation has not only to lodge an equivalent amount of specie at depôts, but has to pay a composition duty of 7s. per cent per annum on notes actually represented by gold or silver coin; and not only this, but as he is limited to four depôts, and as he must make his notes payable at the places where issued, whether depôts or not, he is in practice and by law compelled to keep more than 25s. in coin for every pound his circulation extends beyond the average of the year ending 1st May, 1845. Now, all who understand the habits of the Irish trading classes, high and low, are aware that save and except in times of panic they all use notes in preference to gold; but the banker in Ireland who has surplus capital to employ knows very well that the cost of maintaining a note circulation in excess of his average of 1845 renders it more profitable to him to employ his money elsewhere than in Ireland; hence it is that there are at least 200 towns in Ireland wholly without banking facilities, a privation which in Scotland could not occur to towns and districts of like capabilities. The present Bill is very simple, and confined to one object. It is to enable a banker, whenever he issues notes against coin at depôts, to issue his notes payable only at such depôts. It does not propose to make his notes a legal tender, or to oblige people to take them, if they do not like to do so, in payment of any claim on the banker. The question is not one chiefly in the interests of Irish bankers, and particularly it is not so in connection with the bank interests with which I am myself identified. It is a measure in the interests of Irish trade and manufacture. Wherever a well-managed bank is established an impetus is given to industry such as no other agency can supply. I am desirous that mere technical difficulties should be removed, and in the present instance I only seek to remove a restriction which is in no sense protective of the public, but which is injurious and anomalous. An hon. Member with whom I lately conversed on the subject of this Motion suggested that I should reduce to a formula the proposition with which I startled him — namely, that the security being equal, it was more profitable to an Irish issuing banker, having say £100,000, for example, available for investment, to advance the same at 5 per cent per annum in England, rather than to retain and employ the same money in his ordinary way of business in advances to Irish traders. That proposition I establish in this way — £100,000 advanced in England at 5 per cent per annum produces in one year £5,000. The Irish issuing banker, who, being in excess of his certified circulation, and who is consequently issuing his notes against gold at dépôts, electing to employ £100,000 in Ireland, finds by experience that this money must be advanced at various places, and in the form of bank notes. Save, however, for purpose of convenience to his customers, it is in effect the same to the banker as if his advances were made at once in coin; for Sir Robert Peel's Act, which I do not seek to affect in any way whatever, renders it imperative on him to counterpoise pound for pound the whole amount of his excess circulation by the deposit of coin at one, two, three, or four dépôts. In this condition of affairs the 9 Geo. IV. c. 81, which this Bill proposes to amend, operates most prejudicially, for that Act makes it imperative on the banker to make his notes payable wherever they are issued, and as this issue will rarely be at his dépôts, he is in practice compelled to distribute some £20,000 coin to meet these notes where they are made payable. This will leave him only £80,000 to deposit at dépôts, and hence he is only able to utilize at interest about four-fifths of the sum he has elected to retain for employment in Ireland. The return of interest on £80,000 at 6 per cent per annum will be only £4,800, against £5,000 earned by employment of the whole sum at 5 per cent in English or foreign securities. But this is not the sole deduction to which the Irish issuing banker has to submit. He has to pay 7s. per cent composition duty on the circulation of £80,000 in notes, although these notes are represented by an equivalent amount of coin at dépôts. The deduction under this head from Irish profits is £280, so that an Irish issuing banker, under the circumstances I have shown, has practically a premium of £480 in employing £100,000 at 5 per cent in England or abroad, over employing it as he best can on equally good security at 6 per cent in Ireland.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. M'Kenna.)

COLONEL FRENCH said, he believed that it was not desirable to assimilate the Irish system of banking to the Scotch, and that the effect of the measure would be to diminish public confidence in the Irish banks. This was a serious and important question, and ought not to be brought forward by a private Member in a thin House. He moved, as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Colonel French.)

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said, the Bill did not propose to extend the present excess of issue over gold; it was simply intended to promote the convenience of the public, by affording increased banking facilities, and it certainly did not contravene the principle of the Acts of 1844 and 1845, otherwise he (Mr. Pollard-Urquhart) would not give it his support. He believed the effect of the Bill would be to afford largely-increased facilities to farmers, tradesmen, and others in the outlying towns of Ireland for making deposits which they could not make in the Post Office savings banks, and which there were at present no other banks to receive. He trusted that the House would give a favourable reception to the Bill.

MR. GOSCHEN said, if he thought the Bill would tend to increase the prosperity of trade and commerce in Ireland, he should be glad to give it his support, and he believed the Irish Members would admit that there was every disposition in the House, under the exceptional circumstances in which Ireland was at present placed, not to be bound too strictly by the rules of political economy, but to go as far as possible in introducing any changes that might be beneficial to the people of that country. But he doubted whether the hon. Member had made out his case in that respect. The hon. Member who had just spoken had stated that increased banking facilities would be a great advantage to Ireland; but the hon. Member for Youghal had said he did not wish to increase the number of issuing banks in Ireland.

MR. M'KENNA said, he did not quite say that. He did not wish to express any opinion in contravention to the policy of Sir Robert Peel's Act; but he had no objection, if the House thought fit, to see the number of issuing banks multiplied.

MR. GOSCHEN understood the hon. Member to support the principle of Sir Robert Peel's Act limiting the number of issuing banks. There were six issuing, which at present had a monopoly in Ireland, and the proposal now was that that monopoly should be improved and made more valuable to the country. But the question was, was the House and the country generally satisfied with the present state of the private issues? If there were any idea that the private issues were not on a satisfactory footing, would it be wise on the part of the House to improve the position of the private bankers in Ireland, and make it more difficult to deal with them if at any time it should seem right to the House to adopt one general system of circulation for the United Kingdom? The present question might be considered from three points of view. There was first the question respecting the issuing banks; secondly, the question of how the measure would affect the public; and next, the question of how it would bear upon the currency generally. He confessed he was unable to understand the hon. Gentleman's argument that unless further privileges of issue were conceded Irish bankers would invest their money in England rather than in Ireland. How did the hon. Gentleman propose that the bankers should invest the money? Was it in the funds? The funds were in Ireland as well as in England. Was it in bills? There were bills in Ireland as well as in England. Was it in mortgages? There were mortgages in Ireland as well as in England. As to the issuing of notes, the law in Ireland was more assimilated to the law of England than it was to the law of Scotland. As to the interests of the Irish public, they had more security for the convertibility of the notes under the existing law than they would under that which the hon. Member proposed to substitute for it, because the fact that the notes were payable in the various branches of a bank obliged the banker to keep more gold than he would be obliged to do if they were payable only at certain depôts.

Mr. Goschen

It seemed to him that to do what was proposed would not be in accordance with the principle upon which Parliament had hitherto acted in carrying out the policy of Sir Robert Peel, which was not to encourage private issues, but to discourage them. Nor could he help thinking that the proposal of the hon. Member was to reverse the tendency of the legislation of the House with regard to currency generally. He trusted that the House would negative the second reading, because he felt confident that it was not for the convenience of the general public in Ireland, and because it ran counter to the general legislation which that House had followed with regard to currency. If they desired to develop still further the system of private issues, they should be quite consistent in voting for the Bill; but if, on the contrary, they thought the whole system was not on a satisfactory footing, then they ought not to do that which he could not help calling an improvement of the monopoly now enjoyed by a certain number of banks in Ireland.

SIR JOHN GRAY felt some difficulty in dissenting from the opinions expressed by so high an authority on monetary affairs as the right hon. Gentleman who last addressed the House. With all due deference to the right hon. Gentleman, he (Sir John Gray) ventured to express the opinion that this was not a Bill, as was incorrectly represented, to increase the banking monopoly of the existing banks of issue, but had as its object the removal of obstacles that prevented their being able to extend proper banking accommodation to the inhabitants of the smaller towns in Ireland and the districts around them. It was in fact not a banking question in that sense, but a commercial question—it was not an effort to prop up or to extend the credit or resources of banks, but to extend credit and the ordinary banking facilities to districts now denied these advantages because of the operations of a special Act. He regretted that the right hon. Gentleman thought it right to enforce his peculiar views by stating that the Bill before the House was an attempt to disturb the Acts which regulate the present currency and to alter the present basis—the metallic basis which regulates the commercial currency of these kingdoms. The arrangements as to branch banks which prevail in Scotland are not at variance with the metallic basis, and all that is aimed at by the Bill of the Member for Youghal is to assimilate the laws which regulate branch banks in Ireland to those which regulate them in Scotland, and the operation of which has done so much for the development of the trade, the commerce, the manufactures, and the agriculture of Scotland. The hon. Member for Westmeath, who is conversant with the system in both countries, has given the House his experience of the benefits which extended banking facilities conferred on the people of Scotland. There every town and every village has its branch bank, and every trader and almost every farmer has his cheque book. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Roscommon (Colonel French) said the object was to obviate the necessity for having a pound in gold deposited in the bank cellars for every note of surplus circulation issued, and that this, if effected, would diminish the security given to the public for the conversion of the note. [Colonel French: Hear, hear!] This was altogether a mistake on the part of his right hon. Friend. If the Member for Youghal was clear on any one point it was on this—that the metallic basis of the circulation, the security in deposited gold, would still be pound for pound for the amount of the issue. For every surplus pound issued by the banks of issue as promissory notes, they are compelled by statute to have a pound in gold or silver in the bank till at one of their central depôts. That pound in specie, be it gold or be it silver, is the security to the public who accept the notes so issued. Does the right hon. Gentleman want more than a pound in specie for every pound note issued? ["No, no!"] Well, then, that pound security—that pound in gold—must, under this Bill, be still deposited in the bank till; but the law as it now stands requires that if a branch bank issue a note for one pound, that promissory note must be made payable at the place of issue, and not, as in Scotland, at one of the four depôts, thus in effect requiring that the Irish banks of issue should have one pound in gold in the central or provincial depôt and another at the branch bank from which it was issued to meet the demand for conversion should it arise. The Irish banks of issue did not fear such demand; but they know that many small towns which required banking accommodation on one or two market days in each week would not bear the expense of having a bank staff maintained for the other four or five days, and if notes were by statute made payable in the place of issue or of re-issue the bank must of necessity be open each day of the six and maintain the staff at a loss. Now, what was the result of the two systems? In Scotland, with a population of 3,000,000, there were more than 550 branch banks. In Ireland, with nearly 6,000,000 population, there were 191 branch banks. Scotland with great banking facilities grew rich, prosperous, contented—Ireland was the opposite of all this. Another great fallacy was dwelt on by a right hon. Member, and prevailed largely outside this House. It was said that the £15,000,000 of money belonging to the farming classes and small traders deposited in the Irish banks was inactive and dormant. This was a great fallacy. The money was not dormant—the banks would all become bankrupt if they kept their deposits idle. If one trader deposited money, say £500, in bank at one hour of the day, another trader, who got his Bill discounted and placed to his credit in the morning, drew out the other man's deposit in the course of the day. The money was always kept active, and the effect of the present Bill would be to extend the circles in which that deposited money would be active to the smaller towns which had not now banking accommodation. The moral effect would hardly be less beneficial than the financial. Men would, by reason of opening accounts with banks, become more systematic in their business—more accurate in their trade accounts—more sharp—more enterprising; and trade would be extended and improved, and new industries introduced in districts where none now existed. He hoped, therefore, that the House would allow the Member for Youghal to read his Bill a second time.

GENERAL DUNNE said, the Bill would produce much the same effect as the measure proposed last year by the hon. and learned Member for Clare. The present proposal was regarded in Ireland with suspicion, and he should like to have a more satisfactory explanation of its provisions than had yet been given. He did not think that it would give the people facilities for getting their money. He knew perfectly well that the people of Ireland would much rather go to an establishment within reach of their own homes than to a central depôt to exchange their notes.

MR. SYNAN said, he thought there was very little weight to be attached to the complaint as far as the depositors were concerned that the deposits of the Irish banks were employed in England. Money, like everything else, would always seek the best market; and it mattered nothing to the depositors in what country their gold was employed, so that their interest was paid and their capital was safe; of course it mattered a great deal in a national sense, but that was a consideration which did not enter into the present debate. What had been said respecting the public convenience really told in favour of the Bill, for it would be better to have a bank branch that had the power to issue notes than not to have a branch at all. Nor was it any valid objection to the Bill that the question dealt with was an Imperial one, and ought only to be dealt with in an Imperial manner, for until it was so dealt with there could be no objection to applying a remedy to a particular evil. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen), when he urged that the effect of the Bill must be to strengthen the so-called monopoly of the Irish bankers, fell into an error, inasmuch as whatever monopoly now existed and would continue to exist after this Act was created by the Act of 1844, and if the effect of such a monopoly was to give Bank accommodation to localities which were now without it, the argument was one in favour of the Bill and not against it. Admitting the existence of the suspicion referred to by the last speaker, the Bill, far from being contrary to the Currency Acts, would assimilate the currency law in Ireland to that which obtained in England, inasmuch as it gave the option to the banker to make the notes payable either at the branch of issue or at the head branch of the bank. He should vote for the second reading because its object was to give to the people of Ireland facilities which they did not at present possess.

SIR FREDERICK HEYGATE said, it appeared to him that the proposal was a very safe one, and he could see no reason why an additional penalty should be incurred by a bank when it opened branch establishments. If any small advantage could be given Ireland with perfect security, it ought to be given. He could not understand why there should be any difference in the banking system of Scotland and that of Ireland. What was found to work well for the former country could hardly be disadvantageous to the latter. The proposal did not enable the bankers to diminish their stock of bullion, and it would add greatly to the convenience of the public. The banking system of Ireland contrasted favourably with that of England, and the only fault he had to complain of was that the Irish banks were too fond of sending their money over to this country.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, the whole of the argument of the hon. Member (Mr. M'Kenna) was based on the fallacious assumption that the larger the number of bank notes in circulation was, the better for trade and for the country in which the notes were circulated. That, however, was not the principle which had guided our legislation with regard to the issue of bank notes. The principle of Sir Robert Peel was to place stringent restrictions on all issuing banks, with the view of eventually extinguishing the whole of the private circulation, and of limiting the power of issuing notes to the State alone. It should be remembered that the issuing of notes was not necessarily a part of banking, and there was, in fact, no reason why banks should not be established in every town in Ireland. He hoped the Government would not support the present attempt at a retrograde policy and to deal in a small way with a subject so important.

MR. PIM observed, that nothing had been said to show that the passing of the Bill into law would not be beneficial to Ireland. As for a general measure, it would be idle to wait for that, as it had been promised every year since that which succeeded the passing of Sir Robert Peel's Act. He did not think there could be any difficulty in getting notes changed for gold in any town in Ireland, if branches were established which issued their own notes. As for the argument that Bank of Ireland notes could be issued at the branches of other banks, surely it could not be contended that one bank was to assist in circulating the paper of a rival establishment. It seemed to him that to give the facilities proposed under the Bill would be to confer an advantage on the country. In Ireland they were constantly taunted with not taking example by Scotland, but now when Irishmen desired to follow it in the matter of banking, they were met by a violent opposition.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, that there were in Ireland two classes of banks, those that had a restricted issue and those that could not issue. It seemed unfair to give those that could issue notes an additional privilege. The House ought to hesitate before sanctioning, more especially in Ireland, an inconvertible currency. If a note could not be presented at any issue bank, it was not convertible, and the principle was one it would be most dangerous to introduce. The existing law ought not to be altered unless a very strong case could be made out, and nothing of the kind had been done. It would be as injurious in Ireland as in England to sanction the issue of notes without a sufficient metallic reserve. It was not expedient to disturb the system established by the Act of 1844.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, this was, no doubt, a much more simple and less objectionable proposition than that of which it formed a part when introduced by the hon. Baronet (Sir Colman O'Loughlen) in 1865. The hon. Baronet proposed to make Bank of England notes a legal tender in Ireland, a measure which, had it passed, would have been productive of great inconvenience. He also included in his Bill the provisions now brought forward by the hon. Member (Mr. M'Kenna). The Bill of the hon. Baronet did not pass a second reading. The hon. Member who introduced this Bill told them that it assimilated the law of banks of issue in Ireland to that of Scotland. But their business was to deal with the case by itself, on its own merits, and to inquire whether any advantage was likely to accrue to the public from such a change in the law. What was the law at present in force in Ireland? It was, as the hon. Member had stated, very different from the English law. Banks of issue in England other than the Bank of England were precluded from exceeding their fixed authorized issue under any circumstances. But the banks of Ireland were allowed to issue as much in excess of the issue fixed on the 1st of May, 1845, on a year's average, as they pleased, provided they had an equivalent amount of bullion in certain depôts or head offices to cover the excess. The bullion must be in the depôts, otherwise the Stamp Office would not take cognizance of it. Therefore, an additional amount must be kept at the branches to meet the notes issued at and payable at those branches, which, no doubt, materially reduced the profit of issue. The hon. Member asked that this necessity of keeping gold at the branches should be obviated by making notes issued at the branches payable only at one of the depôts in which the gold was by law deposited. He (Mr. Cave) would pass by the argument often used, that this bullion was a mere colourable security for the issue, and ought really to be there under any circumstances, as a guarantee for the deposits of the bank. Taking the law as it stood, he would simply ask whether or not inconvenience might arise from the adoption of the proposals of the hon. Member. The inconvenience, no doubt, would be less than that caused by the proposal of 1865, inasmuch as the distance from the place at which the note was convertible would be less, and the notes, not being a legal tender, might be refused. But the latter circumstance would not prevent their frequently falling into the hands of people to whom it would be highly inconvenient not to get change at once. If the hon. Member said, as the hon. Member for Dublin had said, that for the credit of the bank, and to prevent the notes being refused by the public, they would always be paid on demand, then of what use was it to disturb the law? But he apprehended that in the case of bank notes this power of refusal on the part of the public was somewhat unreal. Few noteholders were direct creditors of the bank. They had received their notes from third parties, and in many cases were glad to take them rather than not get paid at all. Notes passed as money by custom from hand to hand, even though they were not legal tenders, and great inconvenience and hardship might result from the proposal made being adopted. In the event of a panic, and a run, the noteholder at a branch would be placed at great disadvantage, as compared with the noteholder at a depôt. The latter might get paid; but before the former could present his notes the doors might be shut. Again, noteholders in existing branches would find their position altered for the worse, as the right of payment which they now enjoyed would be taken away for the sake of establishing branches in places with which they had no concern. Were it not for the increased risk of robbery and other obvious considerations, he would recommend the converse of the hon. Member's proposal—namely, that they should enact that the Stamp Office should take cognizance of the bullion in the branches as well as in the depôts. In France each branch was obliged to give coin for notes issued at it, and this regulation had been strenuously guarded. On general grounds it seemed to him scarcely advisable that the currency laws should be tampered with by private Members, in order to remedy special and partial inconvenience, especially when the change proposed tended to the reduction of the capital of banks. The Bank of Ireland opposed this measure, which showed that a difference of opinion existed in Ireland on this point. The Bank of Ireland made every note payable at each depôt, and at nearly all its branches—[Mr. M'KENNA said, there were seven exceptions]—a course which rendered necessary a larger stock of bullion, while the present Bill tended to a reduction of the stock. Into the charges made against that bank it would be impossible for him to enter; if it had acted illegally, it was amenable to the law. The right hon. Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone)—a great authority on such matters—said, in 1865, that there were various points connected with the currency of Ireland deserving attention, so that a more comprehensive measure would be necessary if they dealt with the subject at all. Without imputing the least unfairness to the hon. Member's proposal, he thought, on the whole, that the House should hesitate before adopting it in its present shape.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he hoped the House would hesitate to tamper with the currency. This was nothing but a bankers' question. It was the duty of the House to take care that notes should not be issued unless sovereigns could be obtained for them when they were demanded. The object was to enable men to carry on the business of banking without capital. It was not at all desirable to give legislative facilities for anything of the kind.

MR. M'KENNA said, he did not propose to deviate from the principle of Sir Robert Peel's Bank Act. He did not wish to make invidious complaints against particular banks in Ireland; but, under pressure, having two courses before them, loss or violation of the law, they had adopted the latter alternative. If the law remained unaltered he hoped the Attorney General would take cognizance of this.

MR. MURPHY said, he did not think that the monopoly which Sir Robert Peel's Act had conferred on the banks of issue in Ireland should be continued or increased by an Act of that House, as against private banking companies which were not banks of issue. If the Bill were read a second time it ought to be referred to a Select Committee to inquire whether or not, having regard to the powers proposed to be given, it would or would not militate unjustly against banks of non-issue. It was only upon the understanding that that course should be pursued that he could support the Motion.

THE DUCHY OF LUXEMBOURG.

QUESTION.

EARL RUSSELL: Seeing the noble Earl at the head of the Government in his place I wish to put a Question to him on a subject relating to foreign affairs. Since the House adjourned for the holidays great alarm has been excited both in this country and on the Continent of Europe on account of apprehensions of war between two powerful States, France and Prussia, with respect to the Duchy of Luxembourg. Subsequently the announcement has been made that a Conference has been proposed, and that the proposal has been accepted. I wish to know whether that announcement is correct, and whether the noble Earl feels it consistent with his duty to state anything further in relation to the matter?

THE EARL OF DERBY: The noble Earl has given me notice of the Question he has just put. In reply, I may say that my only difficulty is as to what may be the latest intelligence on the subject, because in these days of rapid telegraphic communication it is not easy to ascertain from hour to hour what is the precise state of the question. I hope, however, without entering into any details with regard to the causes which led to the anxiety prevailing in Europe to which the noble Earl has referred, I shall be able shortly to give him a clear, and I trust not unsatisfactory, statement with regard to the present position of affairs with regard to Luxembourg, and in reference, consequently, to the preservation of peace in Europe. I need not remind your Lordships, that in consequence of the anomalous position in which the Duchy of Luxembourg was placed subsequently to its separation from the German Confederation, to which it was formerly attached, it became a subject of great jealousy between France and Prussia, which led to a misunderstanding so serious that at one time it created great apprehension that it was hardly possible to ward off the impending calamity of a European war; or at least a contest between those two great countries. That prospect, my Lords, was viewed with universal apprehension, and it became the duty, as it was no doubt the interest, of all the neutral Powers of Europe to use their best endeavours for the purpose of averting so great a calamity. Austria, Russia, and Great Britain severally exercised their influence in favour of peace. I think it right to state, however, with regard to Her Majesty's Government, that we have confined our efforts to that object. We have on our part expressed no opinion with regard to the merits of the dispute, either on one side or the other; nor have we put forth any suggestions of our own with regard to the settlement of the question. Whilst this was going on the King of Holland, who is also Grand Duke of Luxembourg, thought it desirable to call the attention of the allied Powers to the very peculiar position in which that Duchy was placed, and its altered circumstances since its separation from the German Confederation, to which it was attached under the treaty of 1839. The King of Holland, therefore, acting in the capacity of Grand Duke, suggested to all the Powers the desirability of holding a Conference for the purpose of considering the present position of the Duchy. That proposition has been accepted by all the Powers; and in accordance with the general desire it has been fixed that that Conference shall take place at an early period, and that it shall take place in London. I am not prepared to say that any fixed and definite basis has been assigned as a necessary preliminary for holding that Conference; but from communications which have taken place between the various Powers, I entertain very little doubt that, if the neutral Powers are unanimous, as I trust they will be, in offering such a solution of the present difficulty as would not in the slightest degree interfere with or prejudice the military honour of either of the two countries concerned, and which would be at the same time in accordance with the wishes of the people of Luxembourg themselves—I have every reason to believe, and, indeed, have hardly any reason to doubt, that such a solution will be accepted both by France and Prussia, and that the danger of this European complication may be averted. It has been universally felt to be desirable, that no time should be lost in holding the Conference. Telegraphic communications are passing between the various Powers almost every hour; but in the meantime it is the general desire, and I trust it will be found practicable, that the Conference may not be deferred later than Tuesday next; that it may then meet in London; and that a very short time will serve to dissipate that anxiety which must be felt by all Europe as long as there is the slightest prospect of hostilities arising between two such great Powers as France and Prussia.

CASE OF THE "TORNADO."

POSTPONEMENT OF MOTION.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE, who had given notice to call the attention of the House to the case of the Tornado, rose to postpone his Motion. The noble Marquess said, he was induced to do so from the fact that a further series of Papers relative to it had only that day been laid on the table, and their Lordships had not had time to make themselves acquainted with their contents. He felt assured Her Majesty's Government would exact that justice in reference to the Tornado which they had obtained from the Spanish Government in the case of the Queen Victoria, and that the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office would take care that the owners and crew of the former vessel had a fair trial.

House adjourned at half after

INDIA—BANDA AND KIRWEE BOOTY.

QUESTION.

MR. DENMAN said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, What proportion of the Banda and Kirwee Booty has been distributed; if not the whole, what are the reasons of the delay, and when the unpaid claimants may expect payment? He also wished to put a similar Question with respect to the payment of the booty to the Central India Field Force.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: The only answer, Sir, I can give to the question of the hon. and learned Gentleman is that at present no portion of the booty has as yet been distributed, but I believe that there is every reason to suppose that it will be distributed very speedily. It is impossible to distribute any portion of the booty until the names of all the claimants entitled to participate in it have been sent in. I have every reason to believe that the list will be speedily completed, when the distribution will take place as rapidly as possible. This answer is applicable also to the booty payable to the Central India Field Force.

MIDDLESEX REGISTRATION.

QUESTION.

MR. CHILDERS said, he wished to ask Mr. Attorney General, Whether his attention has been drawn to the Returns of Sessions 1862 and 1867, relative to the Middlesex Registry Office, showing that the three sinecure Registrarships are now worth nearly £2,400 per annum each; whether he has observed that these officers perform their duty by deputy, although the 12th section of the Act of 7 Anne, c. 20, requires them to attend at their offices daily from 9 to 12 and from 2 to 5; whether he has observed that they levy a fee of 7s. for every memorial of 700 words, and 6d. for every additional 100 words, whereas the Act only authorizes about half that amount—namely, 1s. for 200 words, and 6d. for every additional 100 words, “and no more;” whether he will take proceedings to compel compliance with the Statute in these respects; and, whether Her Majesty’s Government will introduce a Bill to prevent any new appointment being made to these offices on a vacancy taking place?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, his attention had already been drawn to the subject to which the hon. Gentleman had referred, and it was accurate that the present income of each of those officials amounted to nearly £2,400 per annum. With reference to the second Question, he believed it was true that the duties were performed exclusively by deputy. It was, however, right to observe that the Act carefully provided for the appointment of deputies by these officials, and for the discharge of their duties either by the principals or by the deputies, and that subsequent legislation had confirmed that view of the case. In answer to the hon. Gentleman’s third Question, he had to state that it was also accurate that the fees raised were considerably in excess of the particular fees authorized by the Act; but these excessive fees, although without any sufficient or legal warrant, had been levied ever since the year 1768. With reference to the remaining Questions of the hon. Member, he might say that the whole scheme of the Middlesex Registration required revision and amendment, and that, therefore, it would be unadvisable to legislate with regard to it in the piecemeal manner suggested by the hon. Gentleman. He proposed to introduce a measure dealing with the whole subject in the course of next Session. He had had the matter under consideration before the meeting of Parliament, but the state of public business had prevented him from introducing a Bill dealing with it this Session. Should any vacancies occur in the meantime they would probably be filled up; but the new appointments would no doubt be subject to future legislation.

MR. CHILDERS said, that these appointments were in the hands of the Judges and not of the Government, and he wished to ask Mr. Attorney General whether he will take efficient steps to enforce the daily attendance of the gentlemen holding these appointments?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that the Act provided for the discharge of the duties by the deputies. With the prospect of speedy legislation upon the subject, it would, he considered, be improper to attempt any interference at present.

MR. CHILDERS said, he would call the attention of the House to the subject on a future day.

ARMY — COMMITTEE ON TRANSPORT. QUESTION.

CAPTAIN VIVIAN said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether Lord Strathnairn has yet signed the Report of the Committee on Transport for the Army, over which he presided; and, if so, whether the Secretary of State for War will lay it upon the table of the House?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON replied that he had received the Report, and would shortly lay it upon the table.

NAVY — CLAIM OF ASSISTANT-COMMISSARY-GENERAL SWAN.—QUESTION.

MR. STACPOOLE said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, If he will lay upon the table Copies of all Papers relative to the refusal of Assistant-Commissary-General Swan's claim to the allowance of £100 a year as Naval Agent at St. Helena, for the four years from June 1, 1855, to May 31, 1859, the said allowance having been enjoyed by his predecessors and successors?

MR. CORY said, he had no objection to produce the Papers if the hon. Gentleman would move for them.

IRELAND—RAILWAYS.—QUESTION.

SIR FREDERICK HEYGATE said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he intends to bring in any measure this Session on the subject of Irish Railways?

LORD NAAS, in reply, said, he believed that the Report of the Royal Commission appointed to consider the question of the Irish Railways would be laid upon the table of the House in a few days, and therefore he should wish to postpone his answer to the hon. Gentleman's question for a short time.

METROPOLIS — THE CANNING STATUE. QUESTION.

MR. GOLDSMID said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, What has become of the statue of Canning, which used to stand opposite to Palace Yard?

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, in reply, that, in consequence of the increased traffic in the immediate neighbourhood, it had been thought proper by his predecessor in office to give additional facilities for approaching the Houses of Parliament from Victoria Street. A plan was submitted to the House which adopted it, and the works had been proceeded with in consequence of that Vote. The works included the formation of a fresh road from Victoria Street, and an improved footpath which did not immediately join the roadway. At one end of the footpath it was proposed to place the statue of Mr. Canning, and at the other end the statue of Sir Robert Peel, executed by Baron Marochetti. The statue of Lord Palmerston would also be placed in the immediate neighbourhood of the Houses of Parliament, and in its new position the statue of Mr. Canning would, he believed, be placed to as much advantage as it ever had been.

THE LICENSING SYSTEM.—QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, What course he intends to take with regard to the Licensing of Houses for the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors?

MR. WALPOLE said, in reply, that the Licensing Bill had been withdrawn because the Government could not, upon financial grounds, give their consent to the measure. His hon. Friend had asked him if he would undertake to deal with the subject. He replied that he had on several occasions expressed his opinion that the question ought, if dealt with at all, to be dealt with as a whole, and he promised to submit to his Colleagues during the recess a Bill which he believed would be likely to lead to a satisfactory result, a promise which he was fully prepared to perform.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE—THE COMPOUND HOUSEHOLDER.
QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, a doubt appeared to exist in the minds of some hon. Members as to whether the Proviso at the end of the 34th clause of the Representation of the People Bill would, or would not, place the new voter, who might be a compound-householder, in a position different from that in which the compound-householder was placed under the present system. He had no doubt himself as to what was intended; but he thought it unadvisable that they should enter upon the discussion without the point being made thoroughly clear. He would therefore beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer (1). Whether the Proviso at the end of the 34th Clause of the Representation of the People Bill—namely—

"Provided that the rates to be paid by such occupier in order to entitle him to the franchise, shall be rates calculated on the full rateable value of the premises," has reference to the 3rd Section of the Compound Householders Act (14 & 15 Vict. c. 14), which enacts—

"That in cases where by any composition with the landlord a less sum shall be payable than the full amount of rate which except for such composition would be due in respect of the same premises, the occupier claiming to be rated shall not be bound to pay or tender more than the amount then payable under such composition ;"

(2) whether the new compound-householder whose vote depends on the occupation of a house rented under £10 will obtain the benefit of the above-mentioned 3rd Section of the Compound Householders Act; (3) and, whether it is the intention of the Government to subject the compound-householders under £10 to a disadvantage which does not apply to the compound-householders above £10, by putting them in a different position as regards getting on the register of voters?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, with regard to the first inquiry of the hon. Gentleman it is not intended that the proviso at the end of the 34th clause should have any reference to the 3rd section of the Compound Householders Act, although I admit there is some ambiguity in the language. My attention has been called to this fact by an hon. Member of this House, a Gentleman of the long robe, and I will at the proper time propose an alteration which will, I think, remove that ambiguity. That answer, of course, involves a reply to the second inquiry of the hon. Gentleman. With regard to his third Question, I would say that the Government do not wish to connect the new franchises with those that at present exist. The franchises that at present exist, though in some cases analogous, contain restrictions which are not contemplated in the new franchises. I do not wish to place the compound-householders referred to under the provisions of the 14 & 15 Vict. c. 14. I think that that is a bad Act, one founded upon a vicious principle, and though I am not prepared at present to propose its repeal, I should certainly not under any circumstances consent to be a party to extending its provisions.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that inasmuch as the right hon. Gentleman had stated that there was some ambiguity in the words of the proposed 34th clause, he should be glad to know if the right hon. Gentleman would inform the House before going into Committee on the 3rd clause distinctly what was the meaning which he attached to the proviso. It was evidently quite impossible that the Committee could arrive at a proper decision with regard to the clause until that meaning had been stated.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: When we get into the discussion in Committee I shall be ready to state precisely the meaning which I put upon the words. I do not, however, wish the House to labour under a false impression, or to be deceived into the supposition that the clause as at present drawn has any reference to the 14 & 15 Vict.

OBSERVATIONS.

LORD STANLEY: I wish, Sir, to make an appeal to my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton, with reference to a Motion which he has placed upon the Paper, and I do so upon public grounds only. My hon. Friend has placed upon the Paper for to-morrow evening a notice referring to the subject of the Tornado. Upon that question negotiations are still pending.

and after the consideration shown by the Spanish Government in reference to another matter, we have no reason to fear any other than an amicable settlement. I think, therefore, that under these circumstances if a debate were to take place at the present time, the chances of that settlement might to some extent be jeopardized. My hon. Friend, no doubt, would deal with the case in the fairest and most temperate manner; but still it would be impossible, in the general discussion which would of course ensue, to provide against the saying of something which might wound the feelings of a very sensitive and high-spirited nation, and thus render the success of the negotiations more difficult; while, at the same time, any difference of opinion such as might very possibly arise, or the question of International Law involved, would necessarily weaken the hands of Her Majesty's Government. In spite, however, of these circumstances, I should have some hesitation in making this appeal to my hon. Friend, if it were not that, as it is now only the beginning of May, and we can look forward to a sitting of some months, my hon. Friend will be able, during the course of the present Session, to find ample opportunities for calling attention to the subject.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, that this was the second time that he had given a Notice upon this subject, and the second time that his noble Friend had appealed to him to postpone his Motion. He believed he was only representing the general feeling, not only of the House but of the country, when he expressed his admiration of the ability, judgment, and discretion which had marked his noble Friend's conduct of this affair. He wished, however, to remind his noble Friend that although the question of the Queen Victoria was settled, the question of the Tornado, which was entirely separate and distinct, had in no way been affected by that result. The considerations involved in the case of the Tornado were of the gravest possible character. Not only was there the question of the validity of the seizure of the vessel, but he should have to represent the case of the officers and crew who had been so harshly treated by the Spanish authorities. ["Order, order!"] He would not enter into that question at present. He simply desired to justify the expression of his opinion as to its urgency and importance. Still he would defer to the request of his noble Friend and the wishes of the House. He would, however, ask his noble Friend whether the claims made to the Spanish Government on behalf of the officers and crew had been withdrawn, or whether they were still pressed; and he would, moreover, appeal to the Government to assist him in obtaining a day for bringing on his Motion in case he should be unable to bring it on on the 24th of May, to which day he would postpone it.

VACCINATION BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. BARROW said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether he will postpone the second reading of the Vaccination Bill till an opportunity has been given of fully considering its provisions?

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU, in reply, said, the principle of the Bill had been approved three or four times by the House, and it went last year before a Select Committee on the express understanding that the principle of the Bill should not be impugned. He had hoped that the second reading would this year have been passed sub silentio as it was last year, and that any discussion would have been raised on the Motion for going into Committee. He would postpone the second reading till that day week, though, from the state of Parliamentary business, he did not feel sure of being able to bring on the Bill on that day.

METROPOLIS GAS BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. LIDDELL said, he wished to ask, Whether it is intended to bring on the adjourned debate on the second reading of this Bill that evening?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he had been in communication with the representatives of the Metropolitan Gas Companies for some weeks past, and he had proposed some modifications, which they were willing to accept, and to allow the second reading to pass without opposition. As it was very undesirable that the Bill should be kept hanging over he would proceed with it that evening at whatever hour he could get it on. ["Oh, oh!"] He was afraid hon. Members had not heard his statement, that he had, in communication with the representatives of the Gas Companies, agreed to certain modifications, and if those modifications were accepted there could be no reason why the Bill should not be at once read a second time and sent to a Select Committee.

CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. ADAIR said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, When he proposes to proceed with the Corrupt Practices at Elections Bill?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I shall proceed with it when I have the opportunity.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he wished to inquire what is the latest hour at which the Bill will be proceeded with that night?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Not at an unreasonable hour. As to what is an unreasonable hour depends upon the feeling of the House.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM— REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE BILL—[BILL 79.]

(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Walpole, Lord Stanley.

COMMITTEE. [THIRD NIGHT.]

(In the Committee.)

Clause 3 (Occupation Franchise for Voters in Broughs).

EARL GROSVENOR: Sir, there is an Amendment upon this clause which stands in my name to move to insert the words—

“Is on the last day of July then last past, and has during the whole of the two years immediately preceding, been the occupier as owner or tenant of any house, warehouse, counting house, shop, or other building being either separately or jointly with any land within such borough of a rateable value of or exceeding five pounds.”

As I wish to explain to the House the position of my Amendment in reference to the measure, to put myself in a position to do so, I will move to insert the words “then last past,” which would be a merely verbal Amendment. I wish to make this statement in reference to the feelings of those hon. Members who are in favour of a £5 rating franchise; and to show why it is that I have withdrawn the Amendment on the Paper so far as I am concerned. Perhaps I may be allowed to give an explanation of that Amendment, and of the Amendments which follow it. I believe that a £5 rating franchise would have received very considerable support on both sides of the House if it had been proposed at an earlier period of the discussion upon this measure. But peculiar circumstances have occurred since

I gave notice of it. A division has taken place, and the Government obtained a considerable majority. I have consulted hon. Members upon both sides of the House who would have supported the Amendment, and they have assured me, and I feel convinced myself of the fact, that it would now be useless to take up the time of the Committee in bringing it on. The second Amendment that stands in my name refers to the occupiers under the Small Tenements Act. With reference to that I reserve to myself the liberty to proceed with it, if it should be necessary, at a later period of the discussion. The object is to alter the Small Tenements Act and to bring down the figure from £6 where it now stands, to a £5 rating, and at and below that figure to make it compulsory upon the owners of property, the landlords to pay the rate instead of the occupiers. I will say no more with respect to this matter now, except to observe that my reason for proposing a £5 rating franchise was that, although it to a certain extent disfranchised occupiers of houses rated below £5, yet it seemed to me to be a Liberal enfranchisement, and, at the same time, Conservative in character, and calculated to lead to a more satisfactory settlement of the question than the Bill of the Government. I hope I may be allowed to say one word with regard to myself, and mention the answer I have to give to the hon. Member (Mr. Osborne), who said, in a speech made before the recess, that no man in the House had done more than I had to cut off all idea of Reform. I think the best answer I can give to that is, that if I had wished to do that and had been consistent, I should have voted with the hon. Member, and with the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe), against the Government; because if the result of that division had been the success of the Amendment of the right Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), it would have defeated the Government and thrown out the Reform Bill for at least this year. I not only objected to the Amendment, but I was most anxious that the Government should not be defeated, hoping that in Committee upon the Bill I and others might have an opportunity of moving Amendments that stand in our names, and thus materially improve the Bill. Whether it is an accusation or not I do not know—but in the course of the recess the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) stated, either in a speech to his constituents, or in an address at Leeds, that there had been some collusion between the Government and myself as to the Amendments which stand in my name. I do not know whence the hon. Member derives his information ; but it is information of which I was not possessed. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the short speech which he made in reference to the statement of the hon. Member (Mr. Osborne), stated distinctly that there had been no collusion between the Government and any Member on this side of the House. The following night there was a long discussion as to communications which had passed between the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) and other hon. Members. I only make the present statement to acquit myself of knowledge of any collusion. I do not know exactly what in such a case as the present is implied by the word "collusion ;" but if it means an underhand communication, or any proceeding that should not exist between Members on this side of the House and the other, I say distinctly that there was no collusion between me and any Member of the Government. My great object was to pass a Bill that would be satisfactory to the House and to the country ; but I beg to state distinctly, in confirmation of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that there was no collusion whatever. There may be a difference of opinion in reference to the £5 rating ; but my reason for bringing it forward was this :—It is my opinion that while it would have given a Liberal enfranchisement, and would have formed the basis of a Liberal Reform Bill, the proposal would also have been very Conservative, and would have offered a more satisfactory settlement of the question than the Bill of the Government does. Lest I and those who have acted with me in the course I have pursued with reference to Reform should be thought inconsistent, I wish to add a word in explanation of my having placed these Amendments on the Paper. We objected to the Bill of last year because we conceived that it would lead to no settlement of the question, inasmuch as it was founded upon no principle—a figure is in itself no principle—but to alter the Small Tenements Act so that personal rating and voting may go together is a principle of very definite character. My Amendment would insure that the lower class of householders would not be allowed to vote if it were thought expedient to make the owners of their houses, and not themselves, liable for their rates. In bringing forward this £5 rating franchise on this occasion I relied very much upon succeeding in altering the Small Tenements Act, and we thought then that the £5 would be a very good line, fair to all parties, and one which would offer the fairest prospect of a settlement of the question. I thought that it would be right to see whether the impression of the House was in favour of the £5 rating. Seeing that the feeling of the House is against me, it is not worth while that I should occupy its time in discussing a question that I cannot possibly carry. It is for this reason that I have made this statement. It is quite within our power, should the Bill pass through Committee, and not be considered satisfactory, to reject it upon the third reading. At the same time, I sincerely hope that such Amendments as are necessary may be carried, and that the Bill, when passed, may be a satisfactory one.

Amendment put, and negatived.

MR. AYRTON said, that he had an Amendment to propose, and that was to leave out the words "two years," and insert the words "twelve months," as the period of residence for compound-householders. In proposing this Amendment for the consideration of the Committee, he thought it right to explain that he moved it in no spirit of hostility to the course which had been taken by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) who had given notice of, but withdrawn a similar Motion. On the contrary, if he were called upon to express any opinion of it, he should express his entire satisfaction with the whole course that the right hon. Gentleman had pursued in reference to the matter. Nor did he desire to revive any of the questions which were so fully discussed before the recess, or to invoke any of those differences of opinion that had occurred between himself and others on the same side of the House. He thought that his Amendment was one of that purely practical character that did not render it necessary to re-open any of the questions that had been previously discussed. Still less did he desire to express any censure upon the views of hon. Gentlemen who sat near him, and who had thought it necessary upon former occasions to take a course different to that which he himself had adopted. He had no doubt that those hon. Gentlemen were actuated by the conviction that they were pursuing the course which would be most advantageous to the public interests. In the question they were now about to discuss there could be no difference of opinion on either side of the House with regard to the principles which should guide them in coming to a decision; the only question was as to the best practical mode of carrying out by legislation principles upon which they were all agreed. He never entertained for a moment the idea that it was expedient to admit every person to the enjoyment of the franchise because he happened to be a man. He had always thought that there should be a line drawn between those who were entitled to exercise the franchise and those who were not so entitled. And he thought that that line could be best drawn by separating those who had a fixed position in the country from those who might be regarded as a mere fleeting and unsettled population. That, he thought, was the view at which Her Majesty's Government had arrived. He understood that the noble Earl at the head of the Government had, in effect, stated that the object of the Bill was to exclude from the possession of the franchise those classes who might be described as being too migratory and unsettled in their habits to be intrusted with such important functions. But in order that there might be no misunderstanding as to the views of the Government upon the point, he thought it right to call attention to the sentiments recently expressed upon the subject by the Prime Minister. The noble Earl said—

“What are the terms upon which we desire to qualify a man to vote? Temperance, frugality, permanence of tenure, steadiness of conduct, and a continuous period of residence.”

The noble Earl went on to explain how some of those moral attributes were to be inferred on the part of the voter by his payment of rates, and said the reason why he asked for the test of residence was—

“Because there is in large towns a vast amount of migratory population who are the least respectable and the least valuable portion of the community, who are the least known to their neighbours, and upon whom we think it advisable not to lavish the franchise.”

No one had ever accused the Government of lavishing the franchise upon anybody, but the noble Earl went on to say—

“Therefore we claim a certain period, be it one year, a year and a half, or two years—for that is a matter for future discussion—so that the franchise may include all those who are permanent householders, and exclude that migratory population who have no permanent connection with the towns.”

That was the proposal which the Government in the latest exposition of their views had invited the House to solve. He was content to accept the general principle that the Government were prepared to confer the franchise upon all the inhabitants of a town except those who were so migratory in their character that they could hardly be said to form part of the community among which they dwelt. The question, therefore, was what was a reasonable definition of a permanent inhabitant? Her Majesty's Government, in framing their Bill, seem to have been led to their proposal by directing their attention to the Act which regulated Municipal Elections. No doubt it had been a floating idea in the minds of many men that it would be a convenient and Conservative—he did not mean to use the word in a party sense—mode of treating the franchise to enact that the municipal elector should be also a Parliamentary elector. But in practice there were many insurmountable objections to that course. In the first place, the Parliamentary and municipal boroughs were not identical; in some it would be impossible to alter the boundaries so as to make them identical, and in very many cases they would find themselves involved in questions not easy to be solved. To carry out the theory to the fullest extent would be impracticable, and therefore it could not safely be made a basis for the law of the land to rest upon. Still the Government, though they could not act upon the idea as a whole, had evidently entertained it to some extent, for they regarded the two years' occupation, which was a condition of the municipal franchise, as a qualification that might conveniently be introduced into the Parliamentary franchise. In adopting this view, however, they had not, he thought, sufficiently considered the important distinctions between the municipal and Parliamentary franchise; and the moment these were pointed out the House and the Government, he thought, would have no difficulty in abandoning the two years' limit, and adopting the one year's limit which it was the object of his Amendment to introduce. The municipal franchise was acquired by a two years' occupation undoubtedly; but then at the end of two years the roll of electors was immediately prepared, and at the end of two months further came into operation on a particular day, the election always taking place at the expiration of two years and two months from the period of the commencement of the qualification. Under the municipal system, therefore, from the commencement of the right till its ultimate enjoyment, there never could be a greater period than two years and two months. But in the case of Parliamentary elections the system was entirely different. The right to vote for a Member of that House commenced under the existing system at a period of one year from the making up of the first electoral roll, but super-added to that was a period of four months, which was required to make the roll complete. When, then, the voter was entitled to vote at the expiration of one year and four months, it was only a barren right, inasmuch as he might not be called upon to exercise it for many months or even years afterwards. If they reduced this question to an arithmetical computation of averages, inasmuch as Parliament could be continued for a period of seven years, it might be assumed that three years and a half would expire before the elector could exercise the right to vote, after the one year's occupation and the four months for the making up of the roll had passed by. In ordinary circumstances, without considering the averages, it was clear that no man was called upon to exercise his right to vote until some time had elapsed after the making up of the roll in December. If therefore they compared the rights of municipal and Parliamentary electors, adopting the views shadowed out by the Government measure, they would find that there was no analogy between the two cases. They must take into account all the circumstances connected with the enjoyment of the right. Even if they reduced the period of residence to one year, a much longer interval must elapse between the exercise of the one right and that of the other. Treating this, then, as a purely practical question, upon the basis on which the Government had placed it, they were bound to reduce the term to the period which he suggested. They were not legislating for an abstract right, but with a view to a practical enactment. The whole question, then, was between the commencement of the right and the practical enjoyment of it. Tested by that standard, he did not see any ground for the proposal of the Government. He suggested, after having had communications with deputations of the people, that the period should be twelve months. He was bound, however, to say that, according to his own individual opinion, he thought that period was too long ; and he would be rather disposed to suggest six months as the utmost length. He confessed, however, that he would make such a suggestion with great doubt and distrust. He knew that some of the most intelligent of the working classes, who were prepared to adopt the language of Earl Derby as their rule and guidance, and who were just as anxious, and had really greater interest in excluding the migratory or unsettled portion of the population from the franchise, were themselves convinced that with the view to the success of their own objects—having regard to the circumstances under which the right would be acquired, and to the length of time that must elapse before it could be exercised—the period of occupation for the inception of the right to vote ought not to exceed three months. He had no doubt the working classes were best able to judge what was best for themselves ; but he considered six months were sufficient ; and his reason for proposing twelve months was, he frankly owned, to arrive at a compromise. It was a period that might be accepted by those who generally differed from him. It was not to be expected that they could get a Bill passed which would meet his and every other person's views, and therefore he hoped that the Government would adopt this reasonable middle course. The Government had asserted, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had repeated the assertion, and the Committee might be said to have to some extent sanctioned it, that this was a franchise to be considered entirely independent of those which now existed. But he would ask, was it wise and expedient, gratuitously and unnecessarily, to make distinctions between that which existed, and that which it was proposed to create ? To make the change—in a sense—adverse and offensive to the people, unless they were impelled by some irresistible necessity to do so ? Twelve calendar months were the term of occupancy required under the existing law before the occupant could be put on the electoral roll. That was a reason why the same term should be adopted in this Bill. Another reason why the Government should lean to a shorter rather than a longer period of residence was that the present was not a mere household franchise but a general occupation franchise, not coupled with personal residence. The Reform Act

of 1832 provided that a voter need only reside within seven miles of the borough for six months before the registration, thereby giving him a very great personal advantage. It was not a personal qualification, for a man might occupy a tenement under that Act with a cow, horse, or goods until six months before the list was made up. The proposed qualification was of a very different character. When they came to speak of the occupation of a dwelling-house, it was quite clear they would in effect make occupation and residence one and the same thing. They would therefore not give to the occupier of a dwelling-house the advantage which was possessed by the occupier of other kinds of tenement. The period of residence proposed by the Government Bill would have the effect in many instances of practically excluding respectable householders from the franchise in consequence of the attendant conditions. Therefore the qualification would be much more stringent under this Bill than it was under the present system. In considering what would be the practical application of this clause, as it then stood, let them imagine the model working man Earl Derby had depicted who was entitled to vote. Suppose that Christmas having arrived he had elevated his condition to that of a householder, and that he resided where he was employed. In July following he would go to church—or rather he would do so if hon. Gentlemen opposite did not make such mistakes as they did in church matters—thinking that he had risen to the standard of a virtuous man, and to find his name on the list; but he would be mistaken. Upon inquiring the reason why his name was not on the list he would be told that he had not been virtuous sufficiently long. A year passed away, and he again went to look at the list at the church door, and again found his name omitted. Another year would come and pass away, and at last he would find, if he could get through the contentions of the agents of rival candidates, his name on the list. Years might pass by without an election, and whilst all those years were rolling on misfortunes might happen. He might not have sufficient money in his till with which to pay his rates—for tax-collectors never call twice. They would be paid by the landlord, and at the end of four or five years he would find that all his efforts to obtain the franchise had resulted in disappointment. He would have to begin again and repeat the same career of endeavours, be buoyed up with the same hopes, and Heaven only knew when he would have an opportunity of exercising the franchise. Was it therefore desirable to proclaim to the people that they were going to obtain household suffrage, but surrounded with such conditions that in all probability a man would hardly ever enjoy the right they gave him, owing to his being from some crotchet divested of it? They would surround this right with such hard and oppressive conditions that the result would be that instead of having contented Conservative voters upon the list, they would have exasperated Republicans, who would curse the institutions which had given them such a mockery of political rights. There could be no more injurious course pursued than to hold out political rights which could not be attained by reasonable exertions, and enjoyed when opportunity occurred. He hoped the Committee would follow the advice which had been given to it by the Prime Minister and see the necessity of taking heed to the counsel that had been given them. He trusted that Her Majesty's Government would be prepared to agree to his Amendment, and not force the Committee to insist on it, but rather by a conciliatory course adopt it.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 5, to leave out the words "two years," in order to insert the words "twelve calendar months."—(Mr. Ayrton.)

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, I quite concur with the hon. and learned Gentleman that this is a practical question, and I also concur with him that it is not a question of principle. I assure him that I wish I could at once feel it my duty to accede to his Amendment. I wish most sincerely that Her Majesty's Government could have commenced the proceedings of this evening by making a voluntary concession to the extent asked for. I believe it to be the earnest desire of hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House, and of the public out of doors, that the long-vexed question of Parliamentary Reform should be disposed of as soon as possible in a manner satisfactory to the country. I willingly admit that by a large portion of the other side of the House we have been fairly met up to this moment in the conduct of the Bill. Indeed, I do not remember any great measure in respect of which less of party feeling has been shown than has been displayed by the majority of the House with regard to this measure. I therefore admit that it is the duty of the Government, as far as they can consistently do so, to meet hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side in a fair spirit. Consequently, it is with great reluctance I feel obliged to say that Her Majesty's Government cannot consent to adopt the Amendment. The object which the Government and, no doubt, the House have, is that we should not confer the franchise on a migratory and not reputable portion of the population, but extend it only to those whose station in life is some guarantee that they will exercise it honestly and usefully. I think hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House will be of opinion that the Government are making large concessions. They will allow that we are endeavouring to pass a Bill by which every householder in the country, on giving certain proofs of respectability and of competency, will be able to exercise the franchise. It cannot be denied that in introducing a Bill of this character we are making large and liberal concessions. I am sorry to observe that in a speech made recently at Birmingham by the hon. Member for that town (Mr. Bright) he alluded to this part of the Bill in terms which I think were hardly consistent with accuracy as to the facts, or fairness as to the argument. If the hon. Gentleman is reported correctly, he said—

“In addition to this, there is that monstrous proposition of a two years' residence instead of a twelvemonths', as now. As Mr. Scholefield said, twelve months is a great deal too long; for if a man comes into a house on the 1st of August he cannot vote for two years and four months if the Bill passes; and if a man comes to Birmingham from London or Manchester, and takes a shop in your best street—a shop does not give a vote without a residence after the 31st of July, 1867—he cannot have a vote until the 1st of December, 1870. These are the mean and contemptible methods by which these persons”

I presume that by “these persons” the hon. Member means Her Majesty's Government—

“while pretending to give, seek in every little, dirty way to exclude you from the franchise.”

I think I might ask a question including some of those expressions with regard to the manner in which, in some quarters, this Bill has been opposed; but I shall not resort to any such means. I would much rather turn from this language to what bears immediately on the question at issue—and it has been already referred to by the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Ayrton)—I mean the Act of Parliament which regulates the municipal franchise. That Bill was passed by a Liberal Administration, and I wish to ask whether the hon. Member (Mr. Bright) accuses them of “mean and contemptible methods,” or of having resorted to “little, dirty ways” when they brought in their Bill for the purpose of regulating the present franchise under the Municipal Act? What was the object of that Act of Parliament? Was it not analogous, and, indeed, almost identical, with the object of the measure which is now under the consideration of the House? Its object was to enable, as far as the municipal affairs of our towns were concerned, every householder who could give certain proofs of respectability and permanence to exercise the municipal franchise. And what were the proofs of respectability and permanence which the Municipal Act required? The proofs required were length of residence and payment of rates. And here let me call the attention of the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Ayrton) to the fact that he made a serious error in his statement as to the period of residence which is required by the Municipal Act. The hon. and learned Gentleman told us that two years was the residence required, and that in two years and two months any ratepayer in a town would be able to exercise the municipal franchise. [Mr. AYRTON: I said two years and four months.] I understood the hon. and learned Gentleman to say two years and two months; but, at all events, I have before me a copy of the 9th section of the Act, and it is in these words—

“And be it enacted that every male person of full age who on the last day of August in any year shall have occupied any house, warehouse, counting house, or shop within any borough during that year and the whole of each of the two preceding years, and also during the time of such occupation shall have been an inhabitant householder within the said borough or within seven miles of the said borough, shall, if duly enrolled in that year according to the provisions hereinafter contained, be a burgess of such borough and member of the body corporate of the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of such borough.”—[5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 76.]

There is besides a provision that no person shall be enrolled unless he has been rated to all rates and paid his rates. The House will thus see that the hon. and learned Gentleman has made a considerable misstatement as to the term of residence and rating required by the Municipal Act, for instead of two years and two months the term required is two years and eight months. It will be seen, therefore, that the period prescribed by the Municipal Act is considerably longer than that proposed by the present measure for voters for Members of Parliament. But I have another extract to which I will call the attention of the House. I have already reminded the House that the Municipal Act was passed by a Liberal Administration. It was passed by an Administration of which the present Earl Russell was a distinguished member, and during the discussion respecting it he made the following remarks :—

“ While we think it is but proper to have the permanent ratepayers of the town as the persons to elect the Council, which is to have the government of the town, yet, at the same time, it seems to be as necessary to take some precaution that they are neither persons who are occasionally suffering under the pressure of distress, which obliges them to receive parochial relief, nor persons unable regularly and for a length of time to pay their rates. We think they ought to be the permanently settled and fixed inhabitants of the town alone, and those who regularly contribute to its rates ; and we propose, as a test of this, that they should be persons who shall have been rated to the relief of the poor for three years, and who shall have regularly paid their rates for that term.”
—[8 Hansard, xxviii. 548.]

These were the views entertained, not by a Tory Administration, not by the opponents of Liberal measures. This was the language of Lord John Russell in urging, as a proof of fitness for the exercise of a public right, that the persons who were to exercise a great political right ought to give proof of their respectability, their permanence, and their fitness to discharge the duties imposed upon them. Then the hon. Member (Mr. Bright) complained of the long period during which a person may, under certain circumstances, be debarred from exercising the franchise, and I think the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets made use of the same argument. There is no doubt of the truth of that proposition, but I deny that it is an argument against requiring a longer period of residence as a proof of respectability. I deny that it can be fairly brought forward against the present clause, because it would be applicable to all cases—to the one year period of the hon. Member, and to the two years of the present Bill. Even if no length of residence was required, considerable delay would in numerous cases occur before a man could be registered, and thereby obtain a right to vote. With regard to municipal ratepayers there has been a very considerable relaxation of the original Act. That portion of the Act which required the payment of rates has been repealed, though no alteration has been made in the clauses relating to residence. The effect of that repeal, however, has been by no means favourable to the idea of abandoning such securities as are proposed in the present Bill. The question of the securities for the municipal franchise became the subject of inquiry before a Committee of the other House of Parliament ; and that Committee reported that the character of our corporations had been by no means improved by the relaxation which had taken place in regard to requiring payment of rates. But there is another authority to which I may refer. I must remind the House that the Municipal Act is not the only measure introduced into this House by a Liberal Government—in which a long period of residence has been required as a test of respectability. In 1854 a Reform Bill was introduced by the Government of Lord Aberdeen, of which Earl Russell and the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) were Members. That Bill did not propose to extend the franchise as far as the present measure. It proposed to limit the franchise to £6 rental ; but what were the securities which Lord John Russell introduced into that Bill ? The residence required by that Bill was longer than the residence required by the measure now before the House. It required a residence of no less than two years and six months ; and it also provided that no person should be entitled to the franchise unless he had been rated and also paid his rates. So that here are two precedents at least, both introduced by a Liberal Administration, with precisely the same object that Her Majesty's Government now have in view—namely, to avail themselves of such proof as permanent residence gives of the respectability of persons, and of their fitness to be intrusted with the franchise. I would remind the House that if you restrict the residence to one year, it is possible cases may arise of persons being placed on the register without having paid any rates at all. In a town—I know one, and there may be others—where rates are paid only once a year—and it may be by instalments—it may happen that an occupier, on taking possession at a particular period, may not be called upon to pay rates until January, and then he might come on the register without having paid any rates at all. That is an additional reason why we should retain the security of a longer period of residence. There is one other consideration to which I would call the attention of the House. Some have objected to the proposal of the Government that it will have the effect of increasing corruption by enabling parties to put persons on the register by paying their rates. But the longer the term of residence you require, the less chance is there of their doing it. Therefore, the longer residence gives greater security against corruption—at least, to the extent of making it less probable that rates will be paid in this way. I hope the House will support the Government in maintaining this proposal. We feel that while we are making great concessions by this Bill—while we are offering a large extension of the franchise—we are bound to take such precautions and such securities as are fairly open to us, in order that the privileges conferred by the Bill may not be abused. In adopting this provision we are only acting upon the precedents set in the case of the municipal franchise, and in the case of the Liberal Reform Bill of 1854. We believe that the effect of this limitation will be to prevent the franchise being exercised by the migratory and shifting portion of our population, and to confine it to those persons whose steadiness and respectability afford a guarantee that it will be safe in their hands. Justified by these precedents, and convinced that we are only asking the House to consent to a fair and effectual security, I am obliged to say that the Government will be compelled to take the sense of the House by a division.

SIR ROUNDELL PALMER: I heard with considerable satisfaction from the right hon. Gentleman that he and the Government do not regard this as a question of principle—that the difference between the proposal of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets and the proposal of the Government, in the opinion of the Government, does not involve a question of principle. That will be an assurance to the Committee that, if it should think it right to adopt the proposal of the hon. Member, they will not run any risk of encountering the alarming consequences which on other occasions have been referred to. We therefore may with impunity vote as we think upon this question; and, if I do not mistake, it is regarded as a question of principle on this side of the House. I deceive myself if I shall not be able to show that it is a question involving a principle of great importance. I listened to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman in the hope that I should have heard something like argument in favour of this particular proposal of two years' residence as against the proposal of twelve months. The only arguments which I heard were two. First, there were two precedents. One of them, that of the Municipal Corporations Act, is completely inapplicable, as I will show. The other is Lord Aberdeen's Bill of 1854, which has been dead and buried for the last thirteen years. I think it could only have been dug up again when it was felt that there was exceedingly great difficulty in presenting anything like a plausible argument in favour of the proposal of the Government. A majority of the Committee will not be very much alarmed nor rendered very uneasy in their consciences if they vote against something which may have been proposed in Lord Aberdeen's Bill of 1854. The only other argument is—"We are making great concessions. We must have our price for them. This is our security. This is what we expect to limit the effect of these concessions by. Upon these terms we venture to recommend this proposal to the House." But if the proposal of the Government can be encountered by reasons founded on principle, and by evidence of practical inconvenience, such reasons as those which have been offered in its favour by the right hon. Gentleman must necessarily fail to satisfy a majority of the Committee. You have introduced a large measure, and you say that the great recommendation of it is, that it gets rid of the "hard and fast" line of a particular rating or rental franchise. That is the language of my right hon. Friend (Mr. Henley), adopted by the Government. I quite agree with it, and I said so last year. In my humble judgment it is a great benefit to depart from the hard and fast line of £10, or £6, or £5, or any other figure, and to get to the intelligible principle that an occupier who is entitled by a sufficient length of residence to be reckoned as a resident of a borough—and, if you please, if that be the opinion of the Committee, who is rated and is upon the rate book—I accept any decision of the Committee upon that or any other point—shall be a voter without reference to the pecuniary value of the house he occupies. I understand the House to have decided practically in favour of that principle. I agree in the estimate of its value formed by my right hon. Friend. To that extent I agree with the Government. But, having got rid of the hard and fast line, they propose an odious and invidious distinction between the present £10 householders and those who come in under this Bill. I should have thought that not only the abilities and patriotism of the Government, but that the slightest application of the most ordinary principle of common sense to the subject, would have shown the Government that after they had got rid of a hard and fast line, they must give it up out and out for good and altogether. But you propose still to draw an odious hard and fast line, after you have come to household suffrage. You say that there shall be privileges distinguishing and separating the £10 householders from others, not only the individuals now upon the register, but for all time to come. You say that they shall be admitted to the franchise upon easier terms, that they shall be admitted after one year's residence, while all admitted under this Bill must have resided two years. You require that they must not only have claimed to be rated, but must have been rated for two years before. You require that they must satisfy all the obligations about rating by doing more than that which is required of the landlord when he is rated. You thus keep a privileged class divided from others only by the hard and fast line of a fixed numerical amount of pecuniary value, and utterly destroy all the benefit you would otherwise obtain from getting rid of an arbitrary line for the franchise. You are further unnecessarily throwing out the question for fresh agitation and losing the opportunity of settling it now once and for good. Here arises the question of principle. If the £10 householder in boroughs is let in after he has resided for one year, and if you are going to let in another class below £10, why not upon the same terms? If they are worthy to be admitted to the franchise, on claiming to be rated and paying rates, why should they not be enfranchised upon the same terms as the man who occupies a house worth £10 a year? Here is your first point of departure from principle. You say that a man whose house is worth £9 shall have resided two years, but that the man whose house is worth £10 shall have resided one year in the borough. If you think one year insufficient, why do not you propose to alter it in the case of the £10 householder? If two years is the proper time, why do not you apply it to all alike? Any plan of liberal enfranchisement which deserves the name of an attempt to settle the question must get rid of that line altogether, and must enrol new voters upon the same terms as those on which the existing voters have been enfranchised. If the terms upon which the old ones have been let in are wrong, alter them; but do not attempt to draw this invidious and this odious line between existing and new voters. Again, I wish to point out the utter inapplicability of the argument based upon the municipal franchise. It is exercised for a totally different purpose—namely, for carrying on local government. Not in regard to the affairs of the nation, but respecting the affairs of the place in which it is enjoyed. In the case of the municipal franchise you require the longer term of residence, and there may be valid reasons why the residence of local electors should be more completely established. But you do not adopt the municipal franchise as your basis. If you did the gain would be greater than the loss, for you would get rid of the necessity of paying rates in person and of being rated. You must look at the municipal franchise as it is now, and not as it has been at some remote period. But you do not take it altogether. You take out of the municipal franchise one particular thing, which happens to be the most restrictive and unpopular thing in it, and adopt it for a totally different purpose, while you decline to adopt the more liberal provisions of the law of the municipal franchise. I wish also to point out to the Committee what will be the practical effect of the Bill, coupling the provision of two years' residence with what follows it. A person is to have a vote who "has during the time of such occupation been rated in respect of the premises so occupied by him within the borough." He must not only have been an occupier, but he must have been rated during the whole of the two preceding years. If he be a compound-householder, he must have made his claim to be put on the rate book two years before the time when he can have a vote. You require of him a providence and a foresight which would put him under the liability not merely to make the payments, but also to take the trouble to make his claim for two years before he can be put upon the register at all. I regard it as a valuable principle that the new occupation voters should be put on the same footing as the old ones, and that the compound-householder should not be called upon to make greater sacrifices and subjected to greater restrictions than the £10 householder. I hope the majority of the House will take the same view of the question.

MR. M. T. BASS: As I have been called very hard names by hon. Friends near me—such as traitor, renegade, rebel, and what not—I hope the House will give me its indulgence while I make a brief reply to those remarks. With regard to the Amendment, I think it cannot be resisted on any just grounds. You may impose the same condition of a two years' residence on occupiers above £10, but you cannot properly create a distinction between them and occupiers below £10. As I said, however, in respect of the vote lately taken in this House, hard words have been used towards Gentlemen sitting below the gangway, and the hon. Member (Mr. Bright) has used particularly hard words. He has accused me of "treachery." He says that we would "take anything rather than go back to our constituents." That we are "renegades, assisting an anti-Reforming Government to pass a very bad measure." That "there is not much principle or patriotism among us, nor any love of Reform." The hon. Gentleman accuses us of "smallness" and "meanness," and insinuates dishonesty. ["Question!"] I am sure the House will be of opinion that when the honour of Members is impugned those Members should have an opportunity of defending themselves, and that no Member ought to be accused of acts which would render him unworthy of a seat here unless he has so conducted himself as to be really an object of reprobation. I think, then, that my hon. Friend misuses his great ability and his great power of speech when he attributes to those who claim to be honest men very dishonest motives. Suppose, for example, I were to impute to him that he was playing a part in this matter, and was looking for office? No man would be better pleased to see him in office than I should, and there is no office which he is not able to fill, I may say to adorn. But I believe in his honesty—I believe in the honesty of every gentleman until he is proved to be otherwise than honest; but I really think that men who have spent nearly twenty years in this House, and have followed the fortunes of the Liberal party in good repute and in bad repute twice as long, should be spared these unworthy reproaches. I was not in the tea-room, though I should not have been ashamed of being there. But another hon. Gentleman has been indulging in comments. The hon. Member for Sandwich (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) says that I am most unjust and ungenerous because I thought that some Members of the late Government wanted to get back into office. Now, the hon. Member is aware, because he has seen it in print, that rather a strong remark was addressed to me immediately after the division, and that an hon. Gentleman who was in high office told me I had done something shameful. But are we not of "the same flesh and blood?" Are we to be kicked and cuffed, and then to lie down and be thankful for it? The hon. Member for Birmingham tells us that this is a very bad Bill. But the hon. Member for Bradford says there is a great deal of good in it, for it will open the franchise to 700,000 people. He says it is a better Bill than the Conservative party supposed it to be, and he gives the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer credit for much simplicity in bringing forward such a measure. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman takes it as a compliment, but I take it that he understands the Bill.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: The hon. Gentleman is making a mistake, which, I am sure, he will be glad to correct. I did not make the extraordinary statement that the Bill would admit 700,000 to the franchise. I simply said that so far as the limit of the value of the house was concerned it took away the obstacle to 700,000 persons obtaining the franchise.

MR. M. T. BASS: I used the phrase "open the franchise," and I rather think my hon. Friend has now drawn a distinction without a difference. The hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) also said there was a great deal of good in the Bill, and that it might be made a good Bill. Notwithstanding this, we are called "traitors to our party." I am sure no one who knows me will suspect me of any wish to disparage the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), who has led the Liberal party with such transcendent ability. But I have not deserted him. On the contrary, I have acted upon his monition and advice. What did he tell us at his own house the other day? [Laughter and "Question!"] I am upon my defence, and I beg to be heard. He said that we must have a Bill this Session; that we must have a Bill from the present Government, but that it must be a good Bill. Well, that is a term capable of many different constructions. Now, I am for getting the "great deal of good " which the hon. Member (Mr. Forster) found in the Bill. We were told from the other side of the House that the result of an adverse vote would be to throw out the Bill, and then we were threatened with a dissolution. What was to happen next? According to my hon. Friends near me the country would send to Parliament a set of men who would make all things right, and then we were to have a really good Bill. Now, having " something good " in this Bill, I preferred a bird in the hand to one in the bush, especially to a bird of such varied and doubtful plumage that you could neither make fish, flesh, nor good red herring of it. Now, just look. What is the position of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone)? Last year he threw up his Bill and left office because he would not accept a £6 rating franchise. This year he demands a £5 rating franchise, and my hon. Friend (Mr. Bright), who has always been for household suffrage, is content to take that franchise, though he says he would prefer a lower one. If I were to quote from the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman and my hon. Friend last year against a rating franchise, the Committee would be very much amused. I shall not take up the time of the Committee by doing so. They said everything they possibly could in condemnation of such a franchise, showing that it was an altogether untenable proposal, and my hon. Friend added that it was opposed to the Parliamentary institutions of this country. But bad as it is, he is glad to take up with it now. I say, then, that I have not deserted my party; the party has deserted me. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will not think I am taking an improper liberty with him if I remind him that he, above all men in this House, has set us an example of independent voting where he did not altogether agree with his party or its leaders. I should like to know what Gentleman, honourable, right honourable, or noble, who has oftener left his party than he has—no doubt, for excellent reasons. And my hon. Friend (Mr. Bright), too, has been a rebel as often as anybody I know, for when he called himself a Member of the Liberal party he voted against that party in order to turn out Lord Palmerston. In fact, I do not know anything that was so deeply rooted in his heart as the desire to turn out Lord Palmerston. I voted to get a Reform Bill—a good Reform Bill, or, at all events, as good a one as I could get. I believe, in doing so, not only did I vote for the best interests of the country, but I am as firmly persuaded as I can be of anything, not actually proved, that it will yet appear to the country the very best course that could have been taken.

MR. BRIGHT: Sir, I am very sorry that anything which I have said anywhere should have given pain to my hon. Friend (Mr. Bass); but he seems to me in rather an unfortunate position, because the conduct which he has pursued is very much—I will not say what I have described it, but what he has described it—in the language he has used to-night. It is something beyond ordinary comprehension, seeing that he has had to write two long letters to the public; and those not being sufficient, he has now had to make what was for him an unusually long speech in this House in still further explanation, in order to set himself right with the public. I am sorry, too, that my hon. Friend felt that the observations which I made were so suitable a cap for him, and that he put it on. ["No!"] I made no reference—as the House knows, and as my hon. Friend knows—to him by name; and I confess that he was not in my thoughts at the time, and he certainly never could have been when I was saying anything unpleasant respecting any of my countrymen. But my hon. Friend ought to be a little more just himself if he is to be so critical of others, because in one of his letters he refers to what has taken place, I suppose with the hon. Member (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen), after the late division. ["No!"] Well, I only supposed that from what he said just now. He referred to something that took place after that division, and he left the public to believe that he had formed the opinion that Gentlemen on this side of the House took the course which they did on that occasion because they did not like longer to be left out in the cold. That is not a very pleasant observation to make respecting one's political Friends. The hon. Gentleman ought not to be so thin-skinned when he puts into print, not in the heat of debate, but in that cool and healthy state produced by half a day spent in fishing on the Spey. In the cool of the evening my hon. Friend sits down and writes a letter in which he thus describes some of his nearest political Friends. One word now with regard to the point before the House. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir John Pakington) quoted some words of mine, and for aught

I know, quoted them accurately. He thought I used language unfairly damaging to or depreciatory of the Bill of the Government in this particular. I only beg leave to tell him that I believe I expressed most accurately the opinions of the 5,000 or 6,000 of my countrymen to whom I then spoke; and looking at the discussions which have taken place throughout the country, whether at public meetings or in the newspapers, that is the opinion which has been formed of this particular clause of the Bill. I will now address what I have to say to hon. Gentlemen opposite. Some people say that you can never convince anybody in this House, but that I do not quite believe. You do not see men change votes, but I think you do sometimes a little alter the sentiments of those to whom you speak. At the present moment, as I understand it, we have come generally to the conclusion that there should be a large extension of the borough franchise, and we are rather seeking for qualifications on which to admit the people than for restrictions on which to exclude them. I think that, according to the speeches of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Government will admit this, that if they could pick out another 500,000 who were in their view qualified for the franchise, they would have no objection to admit them; for the House has at length got rid of that absurd terror of numbers by which it seemed in some degree actuated during former discussions of this question, and particularly during last year. This is a restriction which is not founded upon any proved, or even suspected, disqualification. It is simply a restriction of the sort which you employ when you wish to get rid of numbers, but it is not founded upon any assumption even that the numbers are not qualified for the franchise. It is all behind the purpose, and has nothing to do with the question, to tell us about what was done in year 1854. You have made some progress since even last year, and it would be absurd to suppose that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) and his Friends have made no progress since 1854. There were many bad things in those former Bills, some because the Government were not so thorough as they ought to have been, and some were because they were intended to conciliate your opposition. But nothing could be further from the real argument than to say that because Lord Aberdeen's Government did this thing or that thing, therefore we in this new world in which we are living—everybody being a Reformer—should go back to those old times and proposals. Nothing would be more absurd. Now, some persons imagine that this restriction is one which would leave out poor people, and those who are supposed to be less advantageous electors. But bear in mind that it will keep out the rich as well as the poor people. I accidentally met with a gentleman last night who came from Lancashire, and he was saying that, from some slight alteration, he had had to wait, I think, a year and a half before he could get himself upon the register of the borough in which he was living. He is a man of great property, and in all probability in the next Parliament will be returned as a Member of this House. If a Member of this House removed into any borough as a £10 occupier, he would be liable to the restriction of the one year; and if he is an occupier under £10, he would be liable to the restriction of the two years, and the seven months, and the four months, up to December, and he would not get his franchise until the election after the December. Therefore every man, from the £10 occupier down to the lowest householder, would be subjected to this restriction. It would not act upon the poorest or most dependent, nor upon any one class in particular, with a view to amend the general quality of the list of electors; but it would act upon them all, and it would act with great difference in different boroughs. I was told by a right hon. Gentleman that in some boroughs it would not make a difference of more than 5 per cent; but I will state what it will do in the borough of Rochdale, where I live. I have taken care to ascertain exactly what is the present number of electors in that borough, and I find that they are under 1,500. If there were no period of occupation, and if the twelve months' residence did not exist, and a man could come on the register without any reference to his time of occupation, then that number would be raised to 1,800. Therefore 300 are kept off by the present one year, and I take it for granted that by the two years' residence 300 more would be kept off. That is a very important matter. In all the towns in the North of England, where the growth of the place is so large as to bring in a constant succession of new occupiers; new houses, new streets, and new suburbs being created, almost continually, this clause of the Bill will act with great severity and, as I

hold, with great injustice. What is the object of it? It is not that it can make any essential difference in the quality of constituencies. You are therefore only cutting off a number of persons who you admit are perfectly qualified, and you necessarily give them cause for great dissatisfaction. I was surprised that my hon. and learned Friend did not, in moving his Amendment, refer to the case of the metropolis; for I hold it to be an absurd, intolerable thing that, with respect to the metropolis, this clause should remain. It is, I admit, one great city, but it is composed of six great boroughs. I am not acquainted with the boundaries, but can suppose cases. If a man living on the west side of a certain street has not lived there time enough to get a vote, and removes to the east side of the same street—say from the borough of Marylebone into the borough of Finsbury—or if he went from the City of London, and crossing the river came into the borough of Southwark, he might go on this way for one, two, and three years—his life might wane away, and he would never come upon the electoral roll. And this man may be one of the very highest class of your artisans, who has been obliged to make these changes of residence in order that he might follow the employment that was offered to him, and thus procure sustenance for himself and his family. I am quite sure if the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had to say a word upon this part of the question, he would not for a moment undertake to defend a proposal like that. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich, though he blamed something that I said—matters of opinion—did not contradict any of my facts. I say if a man came into his house on the 1st of August, 1867, he would not be placed on the register under this Bill until December, 1870. That is a period of three years and four months, and there may not be an election for some years after—in fact, it may be five years before he would have an opportunity of exercising the franchise. Now, hon. Gentlemen opposite have got rid of a good many prejudices; why not get rid of this? After all, in the general reformation of character which one sees in progress, I am sure, with a very little effort, it would be quite possible to accept the proposal of my hon. and learned Friend. The restriction is not for the purpose of maintaining the quality of the constituencies, but for lessening their number. Further, any lessening of the number is, after all, of no advantage whatever in the view of anything that you may consider Conservative in the sense in which the word has formerly been used. You will admit that, unless you have a good argument, unless you have a strong and overruling argument to the contrary, it must be an evil that all persons over £10 must come in under one arrangement, and all under £10 under another. It is clear that between those two classes there would be, I will not say ill-feeling, but there would be a general opinion as to the desirability of making them alike, and of altering this clause in the way proposed. I undertake to say, if this law should pass as it now is, that the first Parliament elected under the Bill would see introduced a Motion with a view to alter this clause, and that you will again bring on a series of discussions upon the question of Reform which will lead on, from year to year, to greater movements and to greater agitation, until, in all probability, you would come to a very great unsettlement of that partial and unsatisfactory settlement this measure will be if this clause be persisted in. Surely it is not for the good of the country, it is not statesmanlike on the part of this House, to pursue such a course when no argument of necessity or justice can be adduced in defence of it. In fact, I believe—and I speak with perfect frankness—that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is as much convinced as any man on this side can be, that the proposition is not tenable and cannot be defended by argument; and that he would really be much obliged if the hon. Member for North Lancashire (Colonel Wilson-Patten), than whom there is not, I believe, a more just judging man, and half-a-dozen other Gentlemen on that side of the House, would get up and express their opinion that the point is not worth much, and that it would be well to make a graceful concession. I do not think it is worth while to use one other argument which occurs to me, because the House has, in some degree, rejected my views on all matters connected with this question of Reform. It is desirable, if you find what has gone before to be satisfactory on the whole, to proceed in the same direction. Therefore I think it an unfortunate circumstance that the Government have proposed, in so many points, to disapprove of the principle of the Bill of 1832. The Chancellor of the Exchequer seems to have a great ambition for the novel and the original, but everything new and original is by no means good. The Reform Bill was good for its time, simple and clear with respect to the franchise. Now, after thirty-five years' experience, the people, the lawyers, the revising barristers, the courts, everybody understands what the Reform Bill means. If you proceed as much as you can on the same basis, adhering to the same simplicity, you will find a great deal to remove and to adopt in order to prevent conflicting decisions of revising barristers, and save the country a great amount of trouble and expense in references to Superior Courts. I have treated this question, I hope, as my hon. and learned Friend has—as a practical question. It is not a matter upon which, if a man was disposed, as I am not, he could introduce anything like heated controversy. It is a question whether you believe your countrymen—such as are qualified by position in life—should necessarily occupy their houses for three years in order to enjoy the franchise. It is simply a question whether you believe that every occupier of a house below £10 rental must necessarily occupy it three years, and it may be three years and four months before he can be placed upon the register. Though he should so long have sustained his family, should so long have pursued his daily vocation, should so long have paid his taxes, and have been perhaps one of the most distinguished and most honourable citizens of his town. Though he has been there one year you will not admit him—two years you will not admit him; he must be there three years before you put his name on the register. Not one of those persons, therefore, can come in until he is twenty-four and twenty-five years of age. Now, what can be the object of a limitation like this? I think you will find throughout every part of the country—and I will not even except your own political party—that there will be general satisfaction if the Committee consent to accept the Amendment. Other points of the Bill will come on in their time; but I may freely state that, as far as I have heard, the general feeling of Members on both sides—certainly the unanimous feeling on this side is, that the Bill will be considerably improved if the Amendment be adopted.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL: I do not know how far the hon. Member is warranted in professing to speak for Gentlemen on this side of the House; but I cannot help thinking that this is a question which is open to fair discussion, and which cannot be decided on the absolute principles laid down by the hon. Member. A certain amount of restriction rests upon the present voters, and the question is whether or not it is right when you grant a considerable extension of the franchise, and go down to the occupiers of a house of the lowest rental, to impose upon those persons an increased test over and above that which is imposed by the Act of 1832. That Act requires an occupation of at least twelve months, as a condition of the franchise. It was not deemed sufficient that a man should have the suffrage simply because he occupied a house and was rated; but the restriction of a twelve months' occupation was imposed for the express purpose of determining his fitness for enjoying the franchise. It is now proposed that we should for the first time admit a large class to the enjoyment of the franchise, and there is nothing unreasonable in requiring that those persons should give some special proof of their fitness for that privilege. A certain amount of restraint must, under any circumstances, attach to the right, and the amount of that restraint is in every case a fair subject for the consideration of Parliament. It is true that by the Act of 1832 the required term of occupation is only twelve months; but that is no reason why we should confine ourselves to that period when enfranchising a large additional portion of the population. The hon. Member says it is very hard that a man who may have lived a certain time on one side of a street should lose his vote if he happens, by crossing the street, to remove into the adjoining parish. But that observation applies equally to the case of a twelve months' residence; and the argument, if good for anything, would abolish the test of residence altogether. It is true that we propose a longer term. The precedent for such a proposal, furnished by the Bill of 1854, was very summarily dismissed by the hon. Member, and also by my hon. and learned Friend (Sir Roundell Palmer), who said that that Bill had been dead and buried thirteen years. Surely, however, it is well to pay some regard to previous attempts at legislation on this subject, and it must have been the result of some consideration that the framers of the Bill of 1854, in bringing forward a £6 franchise, proposed that the new class of voters should be subject to the restriction of two years' residence. My hon. and learned Friend contended that the municipal franchise had nothing to do with this question. But what was the object of Lord John Russell in proposing a three years' occupation with regard to the municipal franchise? The only object of that test of lengthened residence was to ascertain the fitness of the persons who vote at municipal elections. Is not that a precedent for what we propose? My hon. and learned Friend argued that the new voters should have the franchise on precisely the same terms as the present ones, or else that it should not be granted to them at all, and that there was something invidious in requiring a more lengthened residence. I cannot see why it should be viewed in such a light. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) says that the existing law is clearly defined and generally known, and thinks it a thousand pities to depart from the principles of the Act of 1832. He predicts no end of difficulties and disputes in interpreting this clause. I cannot, however, conceive any difficulty in understanding it. It simply enfranchises any person who on the last day of July in any year, and during the whole of the preceding two years, shall have been the occupier of a house. The framers of the Bill of 1854 were of opinion that when the franchise was lowered to a considerable extent it was necessary to have a further test to determine the fitness of the voter. The Committee of the other House, whose Report has already been referred to, held it most desirable with regard to the municipal franchise to maintain a test, and that a stringent one, so as to give the suffrage to those who were fit to exercise it, and at the same time exclude those who could not satisfy the test. At the present time you have a law which is applicable to £10 householders, who have a right to vote under a particular franchise. You are now proposing to enfranchise a large number of persons on totally different grounds. You say to that body, you take the franchise under the conditions now proposed, and you shall all exercise it on the same terms. There are certain restrictions, but they are not imposed for the purpose of disqualifying but for the purpose of testing whether these persons are fit and proper to exercise the franchise.

Mr. DENMAN said, that he looked upon this as a most vital occasion in the course of the Reform Bill. He only wished to utter a few sentences in answer to the remarks of his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General. His argument he regarded as a plausible argument for "trying it on;" but it went no farther. He objected to the proposal before the Committee on two grounds. First, the electors proposed to be enfranchised by the present Bill were men of like passions with themselves, and would feel injustice quite as keenly. He ventured, secondly, to prophesy that if this Bill were passed, making it necessary for a £9 householder to reside three years before being entitled to a vote, when a £10 householder might get his vote by a residence of two years the Bill would not settle the question for a single month, but would lead to a fearful agitation on the subject. If the Government adhered to their proposal, it would be the best card that they could play for the Liberal party, but he hoped that on this point the Government would be defeated. If the Opposition were defeated the defeat would be fatal to Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench as persons undertaking to settle the question of Reform.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: After the grave decision at which the Committee has arrived, it is not in my power, without consultation with my Colleagues, to proceed with the Bill. Therefore, I beg to move that the Chairman report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

THE CHAIRMAN then put the Question for reporting Progress, when several loud cries of "No!" mingled with the "Ayes."

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I noticed that there were several voices from this side of the House in the negative to the Motion. It appears to me that the right hon. Gentleman, having declared that he thinks the decision at which the Committee has arrived requires consideration on his part and on that of his Colleagues, it is impossible for us to go on. Therefore, I certainly should say "Aye" to the Motion.

THE CHAIRMAN again put the Question for reporting Progress, which was then agreed to.

House resumed.

CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS BILL—[BILL 119.]

(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Walpole, Mr. Hunt.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he did not wish to obstruct the progress of the Bill if it was to be discussed. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated that it was a point of honour that it should be brought in on a particular night. For himself, he thought the wish expressed early in the evening by the hon. Member (Mr. Darby Griffith) was a very reasonable one—namely, that some explanation should be given of the provisions of the measure, and that it should not pass through its stages merely as a matter of course. It had not been expected that it would come on at all that night. He did not object to the principle on which it was based, but there was a great deal in the Bill which showed that it had been drawn up hastily, inconsiderately, and without reference to the existing law of bribery, particularly as to the local inquiries which it was proposed should take place under it. He was not then about to enter into the question; but would only say, that if he agreed to the second reading he must reserve to himself the right of making any statement which he might think fit with regard to it on the Motion for going into Committee. The House, he thought, would not be treated quite fairly if a Bill of that importance was pressed on without some explanation of its provisions being given by the Government.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would not press the second reading against the feeling of the House; but he thought they might have taken the discussion on a subsequent stage. If the right hon. Gentleman objected to the second reading he would not persevere; but if the Bill were now read a second time they might have a general discussion on the question of the Motion for going into Committee.

METROPOLIS GAS BILL—[BILL 45.]

(Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. Secretary Walpole, Lord John Manners.)

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [11th April], "That the Bill be read a second time upon Monday the 29th day of this instant April;" and which Amendment was, to leave out the words "Monday the 29th day of this instant April," in order to add the words "this day six months,"—(Mr. Edward Craufurd),—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words 'Monday the 29th day of this instant April' stand part of the Question."

MR. AYRTON said, he would suggest the adjournment of the discussion till Monday, when he thought a more satisfactory solution might be arrived at. It would be inconvenient now to discuss the Bill, and still more inconvenient to dispose of it without discussion. He moved the adjournment of the debate till Monday next.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Ayrton.)

MR. PAULL said, that the gas companies were extremely desirous that no further delay should take place in dealing with this question. He believed his right hon. Friend (Sir Stafford Northcote) had a statement to make which would greatly facilitate the settlement of the question.

MR. J. GOLDSMID said, there was a strong opinion entertained against the Bill, and many who opposed it were not present, not thinking the Bill would come on. Hon. Gentlemen who opposed the measure were not aware of the arrangement with the gas companies, and under these circumstances he hoped the Bill would not now be proceeded with.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he had no desire to proceed with the Bill against the feeling of the House; but he wished to take the opportunity of stating how the question at present stood. This was a Bill introduced by the Government as arbiters between the gas companies and the gas consumers of the metropolis. He might remind the House of the mode in which the question was raised last year. A Bill was introduced on the part of the City of London for the purpose of enabling the City to manufacture gas. That Bill was opposed by the gas companies, and was referred to a Select Committee, to which it was also referred to consider the operation of the Act of 1860, by which the gas companies of the metropolis are regulated. That Committee sat some time and produced a Report pointing out that the Act of 1860 had failed to secure to the consumers of gas those advantages and safeguards it was intended to provide, and recommending accordingly that an alteration should be made in it. The Government undertook to act as arbiters between the consumers and companies, and to introduce a Bill which might go before a Select Committee and settle the question. That Bill was prepared, and it had been matter of considerable discussion. Communications had passed between the Government and the companies, which were embodied in a paper before the House. Those communications had proceeded till to-day. Since the House met the Government had come to a final arrangement with the representatives of the gas companies of the metropolis—the parties affected by the Bill—that the companies would withdraw all opposition to the second reading on his making a statement to the House of the modifications he was prepared to introduce in the Bill. It was for the interest of all parties—certainly for the interest of the gas companies themselves as well as of the public—that if the Bill were to be discussed before a Select Committee no time should be lost. In consequence of a desire to settle this matter as far as possible out of doors, they had already lost the first half of the Session. A good deal of evidence must be taken, and if further delay took place, there might be difficulty in completing the investigation in time to legislate on the subject this Session. The parties really interested having come to an arrangement so far as to enable them to send the Bill before a Select Committee where the terms of arrangement would be finally settled, he did not see why the matter should be further postponed. A number of Gentlemen who did not represent gas companies in London, but water, railway, and gas companies in different parts of the country, had been urged by their constituents and others to oppose the Bill on the ground, as they called it, of principle. He denied that there was anything in this Bill that affected other companies. It was a Bill introduced for the purpose of arranging matters between gas companies and consumers in the metropolis. Let him remind the House what was the peculiar position of the gas companies in the metropolis. Their position was not like that of other companies, one of unlimited competition. They had, by the Act passed seven years ago, a monopoly accorded to them. That monopoly was attempted to be regulated; but Parliament not being very familiar with the subject did not succeed in giving the public all the protection which the Act purported to give. The question, then, was whether they should leave the companies in that position of unregulated monopoly; whether they would attempt to regulate it in a better manner than had hitherto been done; or whether they should attempt altogether to upset the arrangement of 1860, which, no doubt, many persons in the metropolis would be glad to do if no arrangement were made this year. The Government had undertaken this matter in no spirit of opposition to the gas companies of the metropolis, but in the spirit of the arrangement of 1860, for the purpose of introducing such further regulations as would make it work. But if they were to be met by an opposition of this character, which had been displayed by parties not connected with the gas companies of the metropolis, the Government could not proceed any further in the matter. He was authorized, on the part of the gas companies, to state, and his hon. Friend (Mr. Adair) would confirm the statement, that they had agreed to withdraw their opposition to the second reading on his stating to the House that he proposed to modify the provisions relative to the Gas Works Clauses Act, 1847, which regulated the profits of gas companies throughout the kingdom, so as not to interfere with the appropriation of profits within the limits defined by the Act of 1860. He proposed also to omit the purchasing clauses. There were other modifications in the Bill, upon which he had been in communication with the companies, and the Bill would be referred to a Select Committee, with alterations in detail, which were referred to in the printed correspondence. He now made that statement. If the Bill was read a second time he would undertake on the part of the Government that Amendments of that character should be introduced; but if it was the feeling of the House that it was undesirable to proceed with the matter, he had no wish to do so. He could not, however, see any advantage in keeping the matter hanging over; it would be better to withdraw the Bill. The Government had assumed a thankless and disagreeable task when they undertook to decide in this matter. He had himself been dealt with rather harshly. He had received letters without numbers from clergymen and widows stating that the Bill would ruin them, would destroy all the foundations of property throughout the country, and that its provisions were infinitely more to the advantage of the consumers than of the companies. The gas companies themselves were not taking a wise course if they refused to go into a Select Committee and have the matter fairly discussed and evidence taken. If they wanted any arrangement, it must be on the principle that it afforded a satisfactory solution of the question. The petitioning resorted to of which they had, in this instance, the most extraordinary examples, was such that no Bill of any kind could possibly be proceeded with against an opposition of that character. It made a use of the privilege of petitioning which was unfair and not in the spirit of the Constitution. ["No, no!"] The persons who were conducting the opposition to this Bill had sent out circulars and forms of petition, which they requested might be signed by individuals and presented in a mass to that House. Great numbers of persons had been induced to sign these petitions on the representation that their interests had been attacked, which was not the fact. Under these circumstances, the only course he could take in the matter was to regard a decision of the House in favour of adjourning the debate as a convenient mode by which the House expressed its opinion that the Bill should not be further proceeded with. ["No, no!"] It was impossible that this matter could be kept hanging over, day after day, the result of which would be that the Bill would be thrown over altogether, as it could not be got through the Select Committee in time to pass it into law during the present Session. He therefore should decline to proceed with the Bill in the event of the Motion for the adjournment of the debate being carried. The House must recollect that by permitting the Bill to be referred to a Select Committee they did not preclude themselves from discussing its details on a future occasion.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he thought the House should permit the Bill to be read a second time, seeing that the opposition of the gas companies had been got rid of. The petitions of which the right hon. Gentleman complained so bitterly had had the effect of inducing him to introduce important modifications into the Bill, and had enabled him to ask that the Bill should be read a second time. He scarcely thought the right hon. Gentleman would be entitled to construe an adverse vote on the Motion before the House as one which was fatal to the Bill, still he should vote against the adjournment of the debate.

MR. ADAIR said, he had to a certain extent conducted the negotiations between the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Stafford Northcote) and the gas companies on behalf of the latter. As he had stated on a previous evening, besides the question of details which the gas companies were perfectly willing to submit to the arbitration of a Committee, there was a much graver and larger question upon which they wished to obtain the opinion of the House—namely, the question which dealt with their dividends, which they believed were guaranteed to them by the deliberate Act of Parliament. The right hon. Gentleman, however, moved by the petitions which had been referred to, and by the representations that had been made to him, had agreed not to interfere with the dividends, and therefore the gas companies did not consider it necessary further to oppose the second reading of the Bill. The companies were perfectly willing that the remaining question should go before a Select Committee, who, while taking care of the interests of the public, would also protect the interests of those who had invested a vast amount of capital in these gigantic undertakings. With the reservation that their dividends as guaranteed by Parliament were not to be interfered with, the gas companies invited the fullest inquiry into the subject.

MR. AYRTON said, that after the intimation which had been given by the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Stafford Northcote), he should ask leave to withdraw his Motion for the adjournment of the debate.

COLONEL SYKES said, he did not hold a single share in a gas company; but he could not help observing that a more despotic Bill than that of the right hon. Gentleman as it originally stood had never been introduced into that House. It had proposed to confiscate the property of orphans and widows, and it was the duty of those threatened to petition against it. He was glad that the petitions of which the right hon. Gentleman complained had compelled him to modify his original intention upon the subject.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he thought that the Government had acted very fairly in this matter, in which they occupied the position of arbitrators between the public and the gas companies. He wished to bear testimony to the justice and discretion which had characterized the whole of the right hon. Baronet's (Sir Stafford Northcote) proceedings in the matter.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. AYRTON said, he had to advert upon the conduct of the Government. There had been much communication between the late President of the Board of Trade (Sir Stafford Northcote) and the gas companies upon the matter, and it would appear that some arrangement had been come to by which it was settled that the Bill was to be read a second time. As a representative of the metropolis he begged to disclaim being bound by that agreement. They were no parties to it and could not be affected by it. As an arbiter between the gas companies and the metropolis, the right hon. Baronet seemed to have carried on the arbitration too much with a view to the interests of one party. He protested against the extraordinary illusions propagated by the proprietors of gas companies, who had talked about a confiscation of their rights, but they must remember that others had rights as well as themselves. While the gas companies were permitted to divide £10 per cent upon their capital, there was nothing in any Act of Parliament which precluded the local authorities of a borough from starting new gas companies on their own account, a course of proceeding which might speedily reduce existing companies to insolvency. If therefore the gas companies took their stand upon the mere question of right they would find themselves met by rights on the other side which would place them in a worse position than that contemplated by this Bill. The real question both for the gas companies and the inhabitants was whether they should have cheap gas by competition or by guaranteed monopolies. But even then it was a question whether the gas companies should have a guaranteed monopoly without anything being given in exchange. The course the right hon. Gentleman was taking seemed to amount to an abandonment of the interests of the metropolis in favour of the gas companies with whom the right hon. Gentleman had been in communication. The sooner, therefore, he withdrew from all responsibility in connection with this Bill the better for the interests of the inhabitants. He himself saw no necessity whatever for adopting so violent a course, and he had therefore suggested to the right hon. Gentleman the postponement of the debate until Monday next, because from what he had seen he thought there was a disposition on the part of the gas companies to appreciate the whole question, and to endeavour to arrive at a satisfactory solution. He did not oppose the second reading of the Bill as it was now framed; but he did object to any arrangement or understanding being arrived at which was to be binding upon the inhabitants of the metropolis, made without the sanction either of their representatives in the House or those to whom they had delegated authority outside. He thought that the right hon. Gentleman would still do wisely in postponing the second reading of the Bill, and he hoped that some course would yet be taken which would be more satisfactory than the one proposed by the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. HUBBARD said, he was not surprised to find that the Government had brought in a Bill upon this subject. He thought that the competition of gas companies might very fairly be made the subject of regulation. But though it might be necessary to introduce a Bill to protect the interests of the public, he thought that the Government had granted protection in too many ways. He had no objection to the proposal of the Government to limit the price to be charged. That could be reviewed from time to time. But he could not see any necessity for limiting the amount of dividend to £10 per cent. Such a limitation would naturally have the effect of depriving the companies of all inducement to exercise economy in the management of their affairs. If those two matters could be reconciled, he saw no reason why the Bill should not be read a second time.

MR. J. GOLDSMID said, he wished to call attention to a point of order. The Motion on the Paper was that the Bill be read a second time on "Monday the 29th of April." To that an Amendment was moved that the Bill be read that "day six months." The form of putting the Question would be "that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question;" but in case of that Motion being carried, as it certainly would be impossible to read the Bill a second time on Monday the 29th of April, it appeared to him that it would become a lapsed order.

MR. HENLEY said, that this Bill introduced by the Government contained very strong provisions, to say the least of it. They were, however, told by the Government that these objectionable provisions, by some kind of negotiation which had been carried on outside the House, were to be got rid of when the Bill went into a Select Committee. But the House was placed in this mischievous position, that they were called on to affirm the principle of the Bill upon a kind of understanding that certain things were to be cut out of the Bill. This was not a desirable position for the House to be placed in. The subject was not an easy one. The House had created certain regulated monopolies with regard to the manufacture and sale of gas. These monopolies were regulated some six or seven years ago by some summary act of the Government, and now it appeared they were required to be re-regulated. If this were to be done, the Government should do it in its integrity. He thought that it would have been more just and satisfactory if the matter had gone pure and simple, as the phrase was, before the Committee, instead of the Committee being hampered by the provisions of the Bill. It might be said in some sense that the House had affirmed the principle of the Bill; though he protested against being bound by it in any way. He thought the principles unjust, that they should lay down the maximum of dividend which should be obtained, and that when a company had been brought down to a certain position then other persons were to be allowed to buy them out upon terms created by the Bill. That was a proposal as strong as any that they had often been called upon to sanction. If they had gone to a division upon the second reading he should have voted against it. He thought it would be more consistent with their practice that the Bill should be withdrawn, and that the subject should go to a Select Committee. Then they would be in a fair position to deal justly with it.

MR. MORRISON said, he thought it unadvisable that too large a field of inquiry should be imposed upon the Committee at the present period of the Session. All political economists had objected to the 10 per cent regulation. He would suggest that the Committee should make certain alterations in the present law. Let the gas companies have the choice of submitting to the limitation of a 10 per cent dividend, or of endeavouring to increase their profits by improving their method of manufacture. They would then exercise economy in the management of their affairs, at the same time conferring increased advantages on the public. As a matter of fact, with the exception of the last year or two, almost all the gas companies had paid a dividend of 10 per cent. There was therefore no inducement which could lead to improved manufacture and increased economy, and, at the same time, cheaper rates for the public.

MR. KINNAIRD said, that the gas companies were desirous to have all questions affecting their interest and that of the public submitted to the Committee, as suggested by the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Stafford Northcote).

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Honiton (Mr. Goldsmid) has raised a question upon which it will be necessary for me to say a few words. The House will observe that the Question proposed is that this Bill be read a second time on Monday the 29th of April. As we have arrived at the 2nd of May, it is impossible to read the Bill on the 29th of April. That, indeed, would be beyond the power of even an Act of Parliament. The difficulty arose in this way. Late in the evening, when this question was last before the House, and when different Motions were being postponed, the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Stafford Northcote) who had charge of this Bill proposed to put it for the 29th of April, upon which the hon. Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd) moved that the Bill should be read that day six months instead of the 29th of April. I have before pointed out the inconvenience arising from Gentlemen violently interposing with the ordinary course of business in the House. Happily, it is an unusual thing, when a Member having charge of a Bill proposes, from the lateness of the hour, to postpone it, that another interposes and insists upon moving an Amendment to that simple proposal. However, that course was taken upon this occasion, the debate was adjourned, and the matter stands thus:—The original Motion is that the Bill be read a second time on the 29th of April; the Amendment proposes to substitute "this day six months" for the 29th of April; and the Question to be put is that the words proposed to be left out should stand part of the Question. As the hon. Member for Honiton observes, the House cannot properly negative the proposal to read the Bill upon this day six months, and permit the original words, the 29th of April, to stand as part of the Question. I therefore propose that the House get over the difficulty by negating the Motion that the words proposed to be left out—namely, "the 29th of April," stand part of the Question. The Amendment, "this day six months," then becomes the original Motion. If the House negative that also, the Motion—which has not yet been put—that the Bill be now read the second time, can with propriety be put.

Amendment and Original Motion put, and negated.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he moved that the Bill be now read a second time. What he proposed in regard to the measure was, of course, not intended to bind the Members for the metropolis or any other parties. In referring the Bill to a Select Committee an opportunity would be afforded to all parties interested in the matter to introduce Amendments. He, however, only bound himself to the Government proposal. In reply to the observation of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Henley), to the effect that the Government ought not to interpose in this summary way, and that it was better the matter should go independently before the Select Committee, he would remind his right hon. Friend that the subject did go last year before a Committee, and it was in consequence of the Report of that Committee that the present measure was introduced by the Government. It was framed as nearly as possible in accordance with its recommendations. As the gas companies had said that their case had not been fully heard before the Committee referred to, it had been proposed to them that a Bill founded as nearly as possible on the recommendations of the Committee should be introduced, and the gas companies could then have an opportunity of securing a satisfactory completion of their case. With respect to the impression current on the subject of dividend, he assured the House that the intention of the Government was simply to permit the gas companies to increase their dividends in proportion as they decreased the price in gas. This proposal he thought would offer an inducement to the gas companies to be economical, and lead to the benefit of the public, whereas now the companies had no such inducement when they had once reached the maximum dividend. The gas companies had objected that the Government had fixed too low a rate of dividend to commence with. The Government had accordingly consented to let £10 per cent instead of £7 per cent stand as the maximum of dividend, without corresponding decrease of price. To use a somewhat famous phrase, they had no wish to draw a "hard and fast line" at 10 per cent with respect to the dividend, but to make the 10 per cent the starting point, and fix the dividends on a sliding scale in accordance with the reduced price of gas. Those, however, were questions for the Committee to which the Bill was to be submitted. He denied that there was the slightest intention on the part of the Government to confiscate the property of the gas companies.

MR. AYRTON said, he wished it to be understood that no arrangement was made by the inhabitants, the local authorities, or the representatives of the metropolis in the House. They entirely repudiated the whole matter, and as far as he knew they would be entirely dissatisfied with what was proposed.

Motion agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be committed to a Select Committee.—(Sir Stafford Northcote.)

MR. BONHAM-CARTER said, he wished to propose that the Bill should pass merely pro forma through the Committee, in order that the alterations of the Government should be inserted before the Bill was referred to a Select Committee.

MR. AYRTON said, he wished to suggest that the Select Committee should consist of ten Members—five to be nominated by the House and five by the Committee of Selection.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he was not aware whether the forms of the House would permit that.

MR. PAULL said, he thought it would be undesirable that the right hon. Gentleman should pledge himself to the number of the Select Committee. The Bill had better be referred to a Select Committee of five rather, than ten.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, the Bill should be sent in its present form to the Select Committee for them to deal with it as they thought best.

MR. GOLDSMID said, it would be better to commit the Bill pro forma, and refer it with the Amendments to the Select Committee.

MR. POWELL said, he hoped the Bill would be committed pro forma, and reprinted with the Amendments. Much anxiety was felt in the country with reference to the principle of the Bill.

MR. ADAIR said, he agreed with the suggestion that the Bill should be committed pro forma, and reprinted with the Amendments before being sent to the Select Committee. The Metropolitan Gas Bill of 1860 was sent to a Select Committee of five Members, and he thought the House would exercise a wise discretion in following that precedent. A Select Committee of five would be most satisfactory to the House and those whose interests were concerned. The Committee should be moved by the Committee of Selection.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE said, the Committee should consist of ten Members, and care should be taken that they were not shareholders in, or directors of, gas companies.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, that in deference to the opinion of the House, he would commit the Bill pro forma, and introduce the Amendments.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill committed, considered in Committee, and reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow, and to be printed. [Bill 129.]

PUBLIC HEALTH (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Walpole, Mr. Hunt.)

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Graham Montgomery.)

MR. M'LAREN: The Bill now before the House is one of considerable importance to the people of Scotland, and there has not yet been sufficient time to consider the whole of its provisions. At the same time, looking at the opportunity which exists to-night of reading the Bill a second time, I am unwilling to divide the House on the subject. I think it right to state that there are very serious objections to the principle of the Bill, in two points in particular. The first is the clauses which refer to the powers to be given to the General Board of Supervision in Scotland to rule over all the towns and parishes in a manner altogether beyond its province. If the Bill passes in its present form, there is not a large town in Scotland which will not be regulated by this Board. From Edinburgh they can send down one of their own number, or they may send one, two, or three professional gentlemen, including advocates, engineers, physicians, and architects, all at the expense of the Treasury, to examine and report respecting the sanitary condition of any town or parish in Scotland. I should like to know from the Secretary of the Treasury, before this Bill is finally disposed of, whether any estimate has been made of the probable expense which this will entail on the Treasury. Great power is also given to the Board to appoint officers of all kinds, not being members of the Board, such as members of the Faculty of Advocates, medical men, surveyors, engineers, or architects, to act as Commissioners. They can send these gentlemen down into the country for a period not exceeding forty days, and at the expiration of this period these gentlemen go to the Treasury in London, where they are paid as the Treasury may determine. It is a system contrary to the legislation of the last twenty years, to place all the towns and parishes of Scotland under this Board in Edinburgh. The Board is also an irresponsible one, not liable to be called to account in Parliament for any of its acts. It will have far more power in Scotland than the Secretary of State for the Home Department has in analogous cases in England. I have grave doubts whether it would be right to sanction such a proposal. The whole scheme will involve a large expenditure of the public funds for purposes which are not at all necessary. Then, I object to the principle of the assessment. An assessment is to be made for works of drainage and a variety of other things; and it is provided that, wherever manufactories and farmhouses are assessed under this Act, they shall only be assessed at a quarter of their actual rent, while all other houses, shops, and buildings are to be assessed at their full rent. It comes to this, that, supposing an assessment of 2*s.* in the pound made for the proposed carrying out of certain drainage works, farmhouses and manufactories will be assessed at the rate of 6*d.* in the pound, while all other buildings and houses will have to pay at the rate of 2*s.* This is a principle altogether unjust, and should not receive the sanction of this House. It is a well-known fact that certain manufactories, such as distilleries and dye-works, are in many cases the cause of nuisances, and expensive drainage works have to be constructed to free houses from the effects of their evil doings. For these reasons, I wish to be held as not committing myself to an approval of the principle of the Bill, and to be at liberty in Committee to move the rejection of any of the objectionable clauses.

COLONEL SYKES: I should be glad if the Government would postpone the second reading of this Bill. I have not yet had an opportunity of fully communicating with my constituents, who, I believe, will be affected considerably by it.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY: I hope that the House will allow the Bill to be read a second time to-night, because the points which have been touched upon can fairly be dealt with when we get into Committee upon it. As to the question of expense, it is a common thing for the Treasury to have the regulation of the expenses to be incurred by Boards, and the only actual sum this Bill will create will be salaries of three sheriffs, at £50 a year.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE: I hope the hon. Baronet will give us an assurance, when this Bill is again brought forward, that ample notice of the fact will be conveyed to the Scotch Members beforehand. There is a great desire to give certain powers to this Board; but it is a question whether they ought to have those powers extended so far as at present proposed. It would be premature to enter into a discussion now, and I shall not object to the second reading to-night, on the understanding that the full discussion is taken on a future occasion.

MR. GRAHAM: I have no wish to oppose the second reading of the Bill, as, no doubt, it will be of valuable service to the smaller communities of Scotland. But, at the same time, on behalf of the large communities, I think the powers which are asked for on behalf of the Board are too large. There will be an irresponsible expenditure, and in Committee this and other matters will have to be altered.

MR. WALPOLE: Ample notice shall be given prior to the next stage of the Bill.

MR. FORDYCE: I am in favour of the Bill, though, at the same time, I am aware that, as regards the large Scotch towns, there is an opposition to it. In fact, only this afternoon I received a telegram from Aberdeen, asking me to co-operate with the hon. and gallant Member for that city in regard to some of the provisions of the Bill.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday next.

IRELAND—FENIANISM.—PETITION.

MR. BRIGHT: Sir, I rise to present a petition to the House which is of a very peculiar character, and if the House will give me their attention I will state its purport. It is signed by twelve or thirteen gentlemen, who are well known to many Members of this House, and who are persons of first-class education and in good position. The petition has reference to the state of things in Ireland. It begins by condemning secret associations, and the violence which has followed, and expresses a hope that order may be restored to Ireland by the judicious use of power by the English Government. It states that the petitioners remember that the history of Ireland has been the history, first, of imperfect conquest and long neglect; next, of war and the dispossession of the Irish people; then of legal injustice and harsh repression of the disturbances caused by the said injustice. They go on to state their disapprobation of certain things which exist in Ireland at this moment, as, for example, the Irish Church Establishment and the enforcement of a system of land law at variance with the traditions and feelings of the Irish people. They declare that the Government of Ireland is a Government in the interest, not of Ireland, but of the State Church and the territorial aristocracy of England; that by the present distribution of political power the Irish nation is unable to make its wishes adequately felt by the stronger country to which it is bound; that in consequence of the apparent hopelessness of a remedy for the evils which press upon their country—

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE: I rise to order. I wish, Sir, to know whether the hon. Gentleman is entitled to make a speech on the Irish question under colour of presenting a petition?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is in order. He states that the petition contains such and such allegations. In doing so he is perfectly in order.

MR. BRIGHT: They state that in consequence of the apparent hopelessness of a remedy for the evils which press upon their country, honourable Irishmen may, however erroneously, feel justified in resorting to force—that, in a word, there is a legitimate ground for the chronic discontent of which Fenianism is the expression; and therefore some palliation for the errors of Fenianism—

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH: I rise to order. I think, Sir, you decided some short time ago that an hon. Gentleman who attributed a participation in the opinions of Fenians to Gentlemen in this House was out of order. I therefore ask you, Sir, whether the hon. Member is in order in giving currency to a petition and taking advantage of the privileges of the House to read at length a petition which, in fact, justifies Fenianism, which has been condemned by judicial authority and by the highest authority in this House—namely, Sir, yourself.

MR. SPEAKER: The other day, when a Member of this House stated that other Members of the House were Fenians or approvers of Fenianism, I made the observations I then used with regard to one Member of the House attributing such opinions to other Members of the House; but I did not undertake or pretend to prescribe exactly what the language of a petition should be.

MR. BRIGHT: I will now read the prayer of the petition—

“Your Petitioners, therefore, pray your honourable House that it may take such measures as it shall judge fit, Firstly, To secure the revision of the sentences already passed on Fenians, sentences of great, and in the judgment of your Petitioners generally, excessive and irritating severity.”

I ought to state that this refers to the sentences not of this week, but to those passed previously.

“Secondly, To provide in any case that prisoners suffering as Fenians or for a political offence shall not during the execution of their sentence be confined in common with prisoners suffering for offences against the ordinary criminal laws of their country. Thirdly, Your Petitioners, justly alarmed by their recollection of the atrocities perpetrated by the English troops in Ireland in 1798, as also by their recollection of the conduct of the English army and its officers in India and Jamaica; lastly, by the suggestions of the public press and the general tone of the wealthy classes with regard to the suppression of rebellion, pray your honourable House to provide that the utmost moderation and strict adherence to the laws of fair and humane warfare may be inculcated on the army now serving in Ireland. Lastly, Your Petitioners pray that the prisoners taken may be well treated before trial, and judged and sentenced with as much leniency as is consistent with the preservation of order, and that in the punishments awarded there may be none of a degrading nature, as said punishment seem to your Petitioners inapplicable to men whose cause and whose offence are alike free from dishonour"—

COLONEL STUART KNOX: I rise to order. I beg, Sir, to ask whether the hon. Member is in order now?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is entitled, in presenting a petition, to read the prayer of that petition.

COLONEL STUART KNOX: Whether loyal or disloyal?

MR. BRIGHT: "However misguided they may be as to the special end they have in view, or as to the means they have adopted to attain that end." The signatures, perhaps, I may read—

"Richard Congreve, Southfields, Wandsworth; E. Truelove, 256, Holborn; Edward Spencer Beesly, University Hall, Gordon Square; Frederick Harrison, Lincoln's Inn; T. H. Bridges, Bradford, Yorkshire; H. Crompton, 23, Westbourne Terrace; S. H. Reynolds, Brasenose College, Oxford; C. A. Cookson, Inner Temple; F. B. Barton, 29, Lamb's Conduit Street; John Maughan, 1, Pleasant Row, Canonbury; S. D. Williams, jun., Birmingham."

MR. SPEAKER: The question is that the petition lie on the table.

COLONEL STUART KNOX: I beg to move that this petition be not allowed to be laid upon the table of the House.

MR. PEEL DAWSON: I beg to second that Motion.

MR. NEWDEGATE: I oppose the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member, because I see nothing disrespectful to the House in the language of the petition. However we may reprobate the undertaking for which these men are now under trial, still, I think, that when a petition of this kind is brought before this House, praying for a fair trial, and for fair consideration by the prisoners or their friends, it would be most unbecoming of the dignity of the House and most impolitic for us to reject it.

MR. WHALLEY: Sir, there is one paragraph in the petition to which I should wish to call attention, as I think it is worthy of the consideration of the House whether it does not of itself justify the Motion that has been made. That paragraph asks that the troops shall be directed to conduct themselves according to the laws of fair and humane warfare. I would ask the House to bear in mind what I have established, or have offered to establish—namely, that the late Fenian movement had a deliberate purpose. This was that the Fenians should act in connection with the like party in America, so as to afford grounds for demanding from the President of the American Union a declaration that the Fenians were a belligerent Power. In this case, I am enabled to state upon undoubted authority, very large sums are ready to be embarked in the enterprize of sending out privateers. If the House accepts this petition to which their attention is thus formally called, in which our troops are described as being engaged in a state of warfare, instead of in putting down a lot of freebooters and scoundrels of every kind—indeed, every origin except the real one has been attributed to them—I ask whether this fact will not be of very material importance in any future communication which the brethren of these Fenians may think fit to make to the President of the United States.

MR. ESMONDE said, he trusted that the hon. and gallant Member would withdraw his Motion.

MR. SPEAKER said, that the only Motion before the House was that the petition do lie upon the table. If any hon. Member objected to that Motion he might vote against it.

MR. ESMONDE hoped that the hon. and gallant Member would not divide the House. He was as much opposed to Fenianism as was the hon. Member; but he thought that to reject this petition would be particularly unfortunate at the present time. It would be playing into the hands of the friends of Fenianism, and would give force to their endeavours to persuade the people that there was no use in resorting to Parliamentary action in behalf of Ireland, because this House would turn a deaf ear to their complaints. The hon. Member for Honiton (Mr. Baillie Cochrane), who had raised this question, had been previously known as an admirer of tornadoes; but in this instance he had only raised a storm in a teapot.

COLONEL STUART KNOX said, that his object having been attained in thus formally drawing the attention of the House to the fact of the petition which had been presented to them being a disloyal one, he would not divide the House upon the question.

IRELAND—MOUNTJOY CONVICT PRISON.—QUESTION.

MR. BLAKE said, he rose to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether, in consequence of the Report of the Medical Officer of the Mountjoy Convict Prison, that the prisoners confined there under the Habeas Corpus Suspension Act were suffering in health from the discipline they were subjected to, and were likely to suffer still more if the prison rules continued to be enforced to the same extent, it was the intention of the Government to direct that the untried political prisoners should be treated in a less severe manner than they have been hitherto?

LORD NAAS: Sir, in answer to the Question of the hon. Member, I have to state that on the 24th of February last a Report was presented to me which had been made by the medical officer of Mountjoy Convict Prison with reference to the health of the untried prisoners. The greater portion of that Report has been already published in the Annual Report of the Inspectors of Public Prisons, and I have no doubt but that that Report contains the statements referred to by the hon. Member. It is there stated that, in the opinion of the medical officer of the prison, the continued confinement of untried prisoners had tended to operate injuriously upon their health. Immediately upon receiving that Report I ordered inquiries to be made, and the next day directions were given that certain relaxations of the prison rules should be made in favour of those persons. The relaxation of the rules amounted to this, that the time allowed for exercise was doubled, the prisoners were allowed to smoke during the time they were taking their exercise, and they were allowed to walk with a companion. When I was in Dublin the other day, I made it my business to inquire what had been the effect of this relaxation in the prison discipline on the health of the prisoners. I had a long conversation with the medical officer of the prison, and I requested him to make a Report upon this subject. On the 26th of April I received the following Report from that gentleman:—

“With reference to the health of the untried political prisoners at present confined in this prison, I can report favourably. I have stated in my annual Report for 1866 ‘that all serious cases of illness among prisoners of this class were reported to the Government, and have been discharged from prison upon it being understood that confinement was likely really to aggravate their disease.’ There is not at present a single case requiring treatment in the hospital. With reference to the dietary of these prisoners, they are permitted to obtain their own food from without if they please, but for those who do not do so the scale of prison dietary is tolerably liberal and varied, and during the cold weather additional blankets were distributed at my suggestion, so that I met with no complaints of cold from insufficient clothing. The prisoners are now daily in association with each other during their hours of exercise, and are permitted to smoke—a privilege greatly valued. Considering the construction of this prison, and the kind of discipline which is in some degree inseparable from that, prisoners of this class cannot be in association except when at exercise. As the days get longer and the weather milder, I would suggest that all those who desire it should be allowed two periods of exercise (in the forenoon and afternoon), during which time they would be in association with each other. The untried prisoners are allowed books as well from the library of the prison as sent by their friends. Those of them therefore who are capable of enjoying it have intellectual occupation.

The further recommendations contained in this Report have been carried into effect as far as is compatible with the safe custody of the prisoners and the maintenance of the prison discipline.

IRELAND—THE IRISH LAND BILL. QUESTIONS.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is the intention of the Government to allow the Adjourned Debate on the Irish Land Bill to stand for the first business on the evening of Monday the 13th of May?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: As far as I can form an opinion at present, I do not think this Bill will stand for the first business on Monday the 13th instant.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he would beg to ask, if the right hon. Gentleman could say what day the Government would fix to proceed with the Bill?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I cannot at present give the hon. Gentleman the information he desires.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he wished to know, whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to proceed with the Bill during the present Session?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: If it were not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to proceed with the Bill this Session, they would not have introduced it.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he must again beg to ask, what day Her Majesty's Government will appoint to proceed with the Adjourned Debate upon the Bill?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: If the hon. Gentleman ever has the fortune to conduct the business of this House, he will feel that he has made an appeal to me to which it is impossible to reply.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON RAILWAYS. QUESTION.

MR. BLAKE said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Board of Trade, If he can state when the Report of the Royal Commission on Railways, which was promised two months since, will be issued?

MR. STEPHEN CAVE replied, that the signatures would be attached to the Report on Monday next, and that when that was done the Report would be sent to the Home Office.

PROPOSED REFORM MEETING IN HYDE PARK—RESOLUTION OF THE REFORM LEAGUE.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL said, he rose for the purpose of asking the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to a resolution passed at a meeting of the Reform League held in the Sussex Hall last night, by which it was determined (after the reading of the Government Proclamation, prohibiting the meeting announced for Monday next in Hyde Park) "that such meeting be held as publicly notified;" whether, in the event of such meeting taking place, the Vice Presidents as well as the President will be held liable for a deliberate infraction of the Law; and, whether the Home Secretary has received, in common with other Members of the House, a list of the members of the Reform League in which the names of Thomas Hughes, Esquire, M.P., Thomas Bayley Potter, Esquire, M.P., P. A. Taylor, Esquire, M.P., and The O'Donoghue, M.P., are published as purporting to be Vice Presidents of the Reform League?

He begged to apologize to the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. M'Cullagh Torrens), whom he saw in his place, on the circumstance of his name being omitted from the list of hon. Members who were Vice Presidents of the League on the Notice Paper. He could assure the hon. Gentleman that the omission was unintentional.

MR. WALPOLE: Sir, in answer to the first Question of the hon. and gallant Gentleman, I may say that my attention has been called to the resolution to which he refers. In answer to his third Question, I am not aware that I have received any such list; but I believe that in the list of the Vice Presidents of the Reform League the names of the hon. Members to whom the hon. and gallant Gentleman refers are included. With regard to the second Question I have to state that, considering the position which those Vice Presidents hold in this House and in society, I cannot conceive that they will be identified with any attempt to resist the authorities of the land or deliberately to infringe the law of the country.

PROPOSED REFORM MEETING IN HYDE PARK—SWEARING IN OF SPECIAL CONSTABLES.—QUESTION.

MR. R. J. HARVEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If any facilities will be given to meet the general desire on the part of the tradespeople and others residing in the western parishes of London to be sworn in as Special Constables for the preservation of the peace for Monday the 6th May? He understood that a very large number of persons desired to be sworn in, but some difficulties seemed to stand in the way.

MR. WALPOLE: In answer, Sir, to my hon. Friend, and especially in reference to the last part of his Question, I beg to state, not only that I hear that a very large number of persons are anxious to be sworn in as special constables, but ten minutes before I came down to the House I received a Memorial on the subject, signed by 6,000 persons, many of whom, indeed most of whom, are working men; and I am also informed that that Memorial is still in course of signature, and I am told that by eleven o'clock to-morrow morning 4,000 more names will be added to the document, which deprecates the intention of those who have called the meeting in Hyde Park. With respect to the other portion of the Question, I am happy to inform my hon. Friend that in consequence of the applications made to me I have communicated with the vestries in the different parishes contiguous to Hyde Park, or where the police would necessarily be withdrawn to preserve the public peace, offering them every facility for persons to be sworn in as special constables to preserve the public peace.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL said, he would beg to ask if the right hon. Gentleman has communicated with the Middlesex magistrates on the subject?

MR. WALPOLE: I do not think I have had any communication with the magistrates of Middlesex hitherto.

MR. BRIGHT: Sir, I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman a Question, which is this—Whether it is not the custom before proceedings are taken to swear in special constables, that there should be depositions as to the probability of a breach of the peace being about to be committed? It does not follow that because a public meeting is to be held, therefore there will be a breach of the peace. In this country we are accustomed to great meetings, and this alarm is preposterous and absurd—and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not do anything. ["Order, order!"] If the House wishes to debate the question now I will do so; but what I was merely going to remark was, that I do not wish the right hon. Gentleman to commit himself to any course.

MR. WALPOLE: In answer to a Question put to me by an hon. Friend just now I stated that, in consequence of numerous applications which had been made to me, facilities would be offered to persons wishing to be sworn in as special constables in their respective parishes. The law upon the subject is that where there is a riot, tumult, or felony, or where a riot, tumult, or felony is apprehended, upon information of the fact being laid before a magistrate, special constables may be sworn in for the preservation of the peace. Nothing will, of course, be done contrary to the law.

MR. BRIGHT: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is intended that these special constables should in the slightest degree interfere with the peaceful entrance of any persons to the Park; or whether they will be expected to take any part in dispersing the meeting; or whether it is merely intended that, if there should be tumult, then that they should assist in quelling it.

MR. WALPOLE: There need be no apprehension of any special constables being employed for the purpose of preventing persons from entering the Park, or, as the hon. Member calls it, of dispersing the meeting. They will merely be there to assist the authorities in case the public peace should be broken.

MR. BRIGHT: I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the special constables will be drawn up in the Park to make a show of force in opposition to the meeting? I ask this, because I am sure the right hon. Gentleman would do nothing to provoke a breach of the peace. I wish to ask whether the force of special constables is to be drawn up in the Park; and, if so, whether in an attitude of defiance or provocation to the meeting?

MR. WALPOLE: No such thing is in contemplation.

MR. WHALLEY said, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether, with respect to the Proclamation, the reason of its warning was simply with reference to probable interference with the ordinary use of the Park; and, whether he has obtained further information subsequent to the issue of the Proclamation affording other reasons for putting a stop to the meeting?

MR. WALPOLE: I may first of all remark, in answer to the question of the hon. Gentleman, that no Proclamation has been issued. What has been published is a notice signed by the Secretary of State. I am continually receiving further information with regard to the proposed meeting; but the notice which I issued was simply one warning persons not to attend a meeting which is prohibited by law.

COLONEL STUART KNOX said, that as the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) had spoken of "the meeting" in a manner calculated to convey the impression that it had been decided upon holding it, he would ask the hon. Member whether he was authorized by the Reform League to state that fact to the House?

MR. BRIGHT: I beg to inform the hon. and gallant Gentleman that I am not on the Council of the Reform League, and that I am not a member of that body.

INDIA—OFFICERS OF THE LATE INDIAN ARMY.—QUESTION.

MAJOR JERVIS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether he has approved of the Minute of the Governor General in Council limiting the consideration of the claims of Officers of the late Indian Army, in respect of monies subscribed by them for the purpose of stimulating promotion, to such sums as they may have paid in the rank held by them in 1861?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, in reply, that a despatch had been received, and would shortly be laid on the table, which would at once answer the hon. and gallant Member's Question, and render unnecessary the Motion of which he had given notice, as it would show that the Indian Council meant to adhere to Lord Cranbourne's letter of the 8th of August.

HOLDERS.—QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he will, before proceeding with the consideration of the 3rd Clause of the Representation of the People Bill in Committee, lay upon the table of the House the Amendment which he had promised to introduce, in order to remove the ambiguity which he acknowledged to exist in the Clause as at present worded? He would also beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman, if he has any objection to stating at once the nature of the intended Amendment?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: As I propose to address the House on the Order of the Day being read, it would be more convenient for me to answer the Question of the hon. Member upon that occasion.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I wish to refer to the division which took place last night on the question of residence in the 3rd clause of the Bill for the Amendment of the Representation of the People. I regret myself, and I believe there are others who regret, that the discussion upon that question, which I think was an important one, was of so brief a character and of rather a hurried description. These are contingencies, however, which are incident to our form of government, and we must take them as we find them. I thought at the time and rather regretted to observe that misconception prevailed not merely on one side of the House with regard to the character of the qualification as to residence. It was argued generally on what I may call the numerical consideration. On one side, as if its only object was to restrict the number of voters that might under the clause be admitted by the Bill; and, on the other, as if its merits depended upon and consisted of that possible result. I must say that is not the view I have taken of this qualification. Certainly it is not with a view of restricting numbers, or the contrary, that I should propose or support such a qualification. The merit, I think, of this qualification of residence depends upon the principle, not of numbers, but of locality. The great object is to secure that the voter should possess a real interest in the locality with which he is connected. That, I think, is a sound principle, and one that ought not to be lost sight of. However, the House was of opinion that that security for the connection with the locality was unnecessarily large. I have brought the matter under the consideration of my Colleagues, who have deliberated upon this and other points connected with the Bill. Although they regret that the principle of local connection has not been enforced so much as they desired, still, upon due deliberation, they have not thought it inconsistent with their duty to defer to the opinion of the House. Their object has been to establish a borough franchise upon the principle of bond fide rating and bond fide residence. They believe that to be the sound principle, and a principle which ultimately will be accepted by the country as a solution of the many difficulties connected with this subject. With respect to the inquiry which has just been made of me by the hon. Member (Mr. W. E. Forster), I believe the words which I propose to insert in the 3rd clause with respect to the point to which he refers will remove any doubt upon the subject. I propose, in line 8 of page 2, after the word "rated," to insert the words, "as an ordinary occupier;" and in page 2, line 12, after the word "paid," to insert, "an equal amount in the pound to that payable by other ordinary occupiers in respect of," &c. The hon. Gentleman will find, I think, that that will remove any doubt as to our meaning in Clause 3, and it will not, I think, be necessary to make any change in the subsequent clause to which he refers. If it should, it can be easily done, and will be merely of a clerical character. The 3rd and 4th sections of Clause 3 will, with the addition of the Amendments I propose, read as follows:—

"3. Has, during the time of such occupation, been rated as an ordinary occupier in respect of the premises so occupied by him within the borough to all rates (if any) made for the relief of the poor in respect of such premises; and—

"4. Has, before the 20th day of July in the same year, paid an equal amount in the pound to that payable by other ordinary occupiers in respect of the said premises, up to the preceding 5th day of January."

The hon. Gentleman will find when he reads these words and considers them, that they entirely remove any ambiguity. While I propose the insertion of these words in the 3rd clause, I shall give notice of my intention to insert a clause which will repeal the 3rd section of 14 & 15 Vict. c. 14, commonly called Sir William Clay's Act. I have already expressed my opinion of that Act in the House. It is, I think, vicious in principle, and limited in application. I find its provisions are little favoured by the country, and the Amendment will remove the objection that has been expressed to there being a difference between the two classes of voters. I have expressed my opinion that in attempting to increase the franchise in an ancient country like England, one ought not to be too curious about avoiding anomalies; because very often in the pursuit of a Utopian constitution we lose the substance of what might have been obtained. Where it is possible, without inconvenience and without interposing materially with existing rights, it is desirable, of course, to be consistent throughout in our proposals, and it is much better to avoid interfering with previous arrangements. But this is a case, particularly after the vote which the House arrived at last night, which, I think, justifies the course referred to. My opinion is that with the insertion of the words of which I have given notice—as to the meaning of which I think there can be no doubt—and in repealing the 3rd section of Sir William Clay's Act, that we shall be able to carry into full effect the vote that the House arrived at by a considerable—at least, not an inconsiderable—majority, in a very full House before Easter. That is the communication I have to make to the House, and I hope it will be satisfactory.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will lay upon the table the important Amendment which he states he is going to propose to the 3rd clause, so that we may have it before us by Monday morning? I did not quite understand whether he proposes to move the repeal of the 1st and 2nd sections of Sir William Clay's Act as well as the 3rd section. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: The 3rd only.] I wish also to ask whether he will take the debate upon this very important question of the repeal of the 3rd section of that Act before he proceeds with the 3rd clause of the Reform Bill?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: As at present advised, I do not think it is in our power to do that; but I will consider the point.

MR. HORSMAN: I wish to put a question to the right hon. Gentleman arising out of the announcement he has just made, and which, as regards the decision of the Cabinet upon the vote of last night, was the course generally expected and desired. I wish to put a question to the right hon. Gentleman, in order that the House may understand distinctly what will be its position towards the Government and towards their Bill in regard to the further Amendments upon which we may have to vote, and in what sense we are to accept the public declaration of the right hon. Gentleman as to what may or may not be vital points in the Bill. I hold in my hand what purports to be a letter written by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the supporters of the Government. It is dated the 9th of April, and was published in The Times on the 10th, so that it must have been in The Times office before it was received by those to whom it was addressed. I will read it, for the wording is remarkable. It says—

"Mr. Gladstone has given notice of a series of Amendments which he proposes to move in Committee on the Reform Bill on Thursday night. These Amendments are Mr. Coleridge's relinquished Instructions, in another form. The first of these relates to the vital question of residence, and if any one of them be adopted it will be impossible for the Government to proceed with the Bill. I shall therefore be particularly obliged if you will be in attendance in the House of Commons on that evening."

What I wish to call the right hon. Gentleman's attention to is these two expressions in his letter—that the provision as to two years' residence is a vital provision, and that if the term be diminished by carrying an Amendment to substitute twelve months, it would be impossible to proceed with the Bill. I will ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether the letter which is attributed to him is authentic; and, if so, whether it was written with the knowledge and sanction of the Cabinet?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I did not rise immediately because I feared I should violate the regulations of the House, having already spoken, but I trust I may be permitted to reply to the right hon. Gentleman. He wishes to know, in the first place, whether the letter which he has read was written by myself. Really, I have such a good opinion of the taste and talent of the right hon. Gentleman, and I am sure he is such an excellent judge of style, that it will be quite unnecessary for me to give him any assurance upon the subject. I am perfectly ready to take the responsibility of the course pursued. With regard to his second question, as to whether I expressed the feelings of the Members of the Cabinet in the letter, I can say that, in expressing any opinion, upon any important political subject at least, it is my endeavour always to express the opinion of my Colleagues. It is not always in my power to collect them together and formally to ask their opinion upon every question; but I believe, in expressing the opinion contained in the letter referred to, I did express the general opinion of my Colleagues. As to particular epithets which might be used in a circular to the political supporters of the Government at a moment of great exigency, and as to the light in which the Government regard those epithets, if the state of business in this House rendered it advisable I might make several observations which would lead the House, perhaps, to an inference contrary to that drawn by the right hon. Gentleman from those expressions. I certainly wished to state that, in the opinion of the Government, this was a matter of great importance. But I would ask the House to view that letter in a spirit of candour. That letter was not addressed to this particular question—to this sole question of residence—nor was it even confined to this particular portion of the Bill. It was written under very different circumstances from those in which the question now presents itself to the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) had fairly, and I think most legitimately, challenged the general policy of the Government on this question of the borough franchise, and had given notice of a series of Amendments. I called the attention of my Friends to what might fairly be looked upon as an attempt to substitute another policy for that which, with their confidence and approval, I had brought before the House. It so happened that when the right hon. Gentleman gave these notices, the first subject which he touched upon among those to which he proposed to call our attention was that of residence. In my letter I directed the attention of my Friends to this series of Amendments, which, if carried, would have entirely subverted the policy which we recommended, and, as the point of residence claimed our attention first, I wrote accordingly. But the right hon. Gentleman afterwards substituted another point, which he doubtless considered more vital, and the decision of the House was taken upon that. If that had occurred at the time I wrote, I certainly should not have referred, as I did, to the point of residence. When we had yesterday to consider the circumstances we found them very different indeed from what they were on the 9th of April, when that circular was issued. Since then, after a solemn discussion, a very full House came to the decision that the general policy which the Government recommended should in its main principles be adopted, and that the course which the right hon. Gentleman proposed should not be adopted. Surely, then, everybody of candid mind must feel that the question of residence alone must now be considered in a very different light to that in which it before stood. I regretted the decision at which the House arrived yesterday very much. I wish the question had been discussed at greater length. But the point which the Cabinet had to consider was whether, having in their hands the conduct of a measure of such vast dimensions and importance, they ought to throw up the control and further progress of that measure because the House had arrived at a decision upon one point under circumstances totally different from those in which some time before I felt it my duty to call the attention of my Friends to the subject. I say frankly to the Committee, as the author of that letter, and not at all ashamed of writing that letter, which I think was a very good one, my opinion is that the letter did express the sentiments of my Colleagues, many of whom I had the opportunity of consulting individually before I wrote it. I am sure every candid mind must feel that the course which we took yesterday, or, rather, which we have taken to-day, upon due consideration, is one consistent with our character as men of honour, and the duty which we owe to our Sovereign and the country.

MR. OSBORNE: I rise not to continue the debate, but to give a public notice. I give notice to the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), who in my absence made comments which concern me, that I shall call upon him on Monday next to produce the original minute of the conversation he referred to.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I am sorry that I have to put another question to the Chancellor of the Exchequer in reference to the important statements he has made; but I am sure that it is his wish to give every information to the House. I understood that he proposes to move a clause to repeal a section of the 13 & 14 Vict. I wish to ask whether he will let us have the exact terms of the clause by Monday morning?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Yes.

IRELAND—FENIAN PRISONERS. QUESTION.

MR. MAGUIRE: I am sorry, Sir, to interpose between the House and my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham; but in justice to the unhappy men I now represent, I cannot possibly waive the privilege which I possess. I rise for the purpose of calling attention to certain statements which, appearing in The Irishman newspaper, have been widely circulated by the public press of the United Kingdom, and which are sure to be copied into every English printed newspaper in the British Colonies, and throughout the United States of America. These statements purport to be extracts from the diary of one of the political prisoners now undergoing penal servitude in the Government prisons of this country, and sent for publication by a relative of one of those prisoners. I may here remark that I feel convinced the conductors of The Irishman would not have inserted that communication if they were not fully satisfied that the statements which it contained were made in honesty and good faith. It is due to the honour of this House, and to its character for sincerity and consistency—it is due to the honour of this country, and its character for sincerity and consistency—that these statements should receive the gravest attention and the most patient consideration. I shall not attempt to condense statements the reading of which will occupy but a few minutes, nor shall I substitute my own language for that in which the alleged facts are so simply stated. I do, Sir, ask at least from Liberal English Members, with whom I am associated for the purpose of giving freedom to the people of England, their attention while I place before the House the details of the gross and grievous indignities to which political prisoners have been subjected in the Government prisons of the British Empire. In the depth of winter, according to this statement, the flannels were taken from the prisoners, and their clothes removed from their cells at night. In one prison, when the bell rang at a quarter to nine o'clock at night, they were all stripped naked, and stood shivering in the cold till the warders came to take their clothes away. It was stated that—

“One of the prisoners—Lynch—caught cold, and died from the loss of his flannels. The gruel which they got for supper had such an effect on Luby and Keane as to cause dysentery. On complaining to the doctor he said they were ‘malingering.’ From thenceforth while at Pentonville, they got nothing but bread and water, as they could not take the gruel. They were removed from Pontonville to Portland on the 14th of May, and were three months in Portland before the Deputy Governor made himself acquainted with the fact that those two men could not take gruel. They were all told on removal that it was for the benefit of their health they were sent to Portland. On their arrival they were kept one hour stripped naked, waiting for inspection by the doctor. Anyone who attempted to make a statement to the doctor about his health, was told rudely to hold his tongue. Kickham was then suffering severely from scrofula, caused by bad air and loose diet. Roantree was suffering from bleeding piles”—

[Laughter.] I can see nothing laughable in the statement I am making. I confess, Sir, I do not envy the feelings of the men who can make such misery an object of mockery.

“Roantree,” the diarist said, “was suffering from bleeding piles. Although he made several applications to the doctor, he was still kept working in the quarries, losing large quantities of blood every day. The place where he stood while working used to be saturated with blood. He at length, on applying to the Director, was taken to the hospital, and after being some time treated there, was pronounced incurable. In the week ending October 12, he lost a quart of blood. Their first employment at Portland was washing the convicts’ clothes, in a room the temperature of which was 140 degrees. Several got sickness from washing the infirmity linen. Charles Underwood O'Connell fainted from loathing. Kickham, notwithstanding the state of his health (with ulcers all over his body), was employed here with the rest. He was obliged to be removed to hospital, where he remained for three weeks. Before he was cured he was sent into the quarries to break stones. The overseers constantly abused him because he was not able to do more work. Owing to his extreme shortsightedness he was unable to do as much work as others; on this account the officers often shoved him about in a most brutal manner. He remained at work for nearly three weeks, although in a wretched state of health. At this time the doctor never inquired after him; but at length he became so bad he had to be removed in the middle of the night to hospital. He there had to apply to the Director for better food. He said, in reply, that he had no authority to order it to him. He was invalided and sent to Woking. (Seven or eight have been invalided within twelve months after their conviction.) At Woking, Mr. Kickham, a man of education, of refinement, and genius, was associated with a monster in human form. The sufferings he endured in consequence are too shocking to more than merely allude to. At Portland the most arbitrary and contradictory orders were given by the Governor with reference to communication between the prisoners. The tools furnished for breaking stones there were so bad that one prisoner, Martin Hanley Carey, broke two of his fingers, and before he was cured he was compelled to go to the quarry and break with his left hand. By a refinement of cruelty Luby was refused a letter which had come from his wife, and such was the effect on his mind that he was threatened with brain fever. These political prisoners were compelled to clean out the water-closet every Monday in their turn."

It was further stated that those men were kept working in the rain till their ordinary covering was completely saturated, when they then put on a serge shirt, and were marched to a shed, which they could not leave until the officer in charge whistled, and they were then obliged to go to bed in their wet clothing. I do not dwell on the fact that they were subjected to the most arbitrary restraints and the most contradictory orders. One day they were compelled to speak in a low voice, another day they were ordered to converse in a loud voice, and a third day they would not be allowed to speak at all. These, then, are the complaints, or the substance of the complaints, made in the name of the unhappy men who allowed themselves to be involved in the Fenian conspiracy, and are now suffering the most terrible punishment for a political offence. Now, Sir, if there be an assembly in the world in which a broad, a wide, and strongly marked difference has been made between offences of a political character, and offences of a moral nature, that assembly is the British House of Commons. I have heard the most eloquent denunciations, from both sides of this House, lavished on Governments—foreign Governments—who placed the conspirator or the insurgent in the same category with those whom all civilized nations regard as branded felons—men whose infamous crimes have justly condemned them to a degrading doom. The English people speaking through their Parliament, their pulpits, their platform and their press, have pronounced solemn judgment on the sins of other Governments in this respect; and are they to play the contemptible part of the hypocrite and the Pharisee, and shrink from applying to the conduct of their own Government, or those for whom that Government is responsible, which they so lavishly apply to others. Sir, I do not for one moment think so meanly of the great English people as to believe that they would sanction, under any plea or pretence whatever, the perpetration of these cowardly and inhuman brutalities—on men, too, untainted by moral crime—by men who have offended in common with those whom they have defied for their resistance to foreign Governments and foreign rulers. Sir, let hon. Gentlemen who hold opposite opinions to those held by the mass of mankind, say what they please and think what they please, it is impossible for them to bridge over the impassable gulf which separates political offences from crimes of moral turpitude, and the attempt to conform them by similarity of punishment and degradation only revolts the moral sense, and outrages the feelings of every humane and enlightened people. Sir, I hope there is not a man in this House who would not be ashamed to rise in his place and justify the treatment to which these unhappy Irish prisoners have been subjected. You hear of these men being kept for an hour naked, awaiting the inspection of the doctor—of food causing them the most cruel sufferings—of one man with the blood dropping from him on the ground while he toiled at his work—of another who had broken two of his fingers, and, before the right hand was cured, compelled to work with his left—of a man of education and refinement associated with a brute in human shape—yes, of gentlemen by education and feeling degraded to the loathsome task of emptying privies in their turn. Sir, I say it is shameful—infamous—and the man who rises to defend it will be rebuked by the indignation of the English people. And

God knows, Sir, penal servitude is punishment enough for patriotism the most erratic or the most misguided. Its utter isolation from the active moving world without—its severance of all those ties which human affection, the love of the husband and the father, coils round the heart of man, its terrible monotony, its more terrible association, the coarse and scanty food, the hard and ceaseless toil, the garb of shame, the cage-like cell, the brutal insolence of the unsympathizing gaolers—surely, Sir, this is punishment enough, even for him who has loved his country “not wisely, but too well,” without superadding to it wanton cruelty and shameful indignities. I shall now, Sir, ask the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary if his attention has been called to certain statements which lately appeared in the newspapers in reference to alleged harsh and cruel treatment of prisoners undergoing penal servitude for political offences; and, if so, whether he has made any inquiry with respect to them, and taken any steps, or given any orders, in consequence? and I would further ask him whether, if such statement be true, the treatment which they represent as inflicted on political prisoners is not opposed to the frequently-expressed opinion of this Assembly, and a violation of the unwritten law which is cherished in the heart of every civilized nation.

THE O'DONOGHUE said, he was well aware that many hon. Members had strong prejudices against the Irish political prisoners, owing to the conclusion they had come to that they had been actuated by the worst possible motives. He would not now stop to discuss the reasons which seemed to justify them in coming to that conclusion. He believed that the mass of the people of Ireland and the mass of the people of England did not participate in this view—and that they could not sanction the treatment which those prisoners received, and were profoundly touched by their present deplorable condition. He owned he shared to the fullest extent in that feeling of sympathy, for he was as certain as he was of his own existence that those unfortunate men who were now undergoing penal servitude at Pentonville and at Portland were solely animated by a desire to relieve their country from gross misgovernment, and that they had never recommended an appeal to arms until they felt convinced that every other mode of seeking redress was unavailing. In reviewing the acts of those men it was impossible to keep out of sight the past and present condition of Ireland; and if truth compelled the acknowledgment, as he believed it did, that that condition was one of uninterrupted misgovernment, then he concluded there was no justification whatever for the assumption that those men were mere revolutionists, actuated by a desire to subvert social order for some wicked purposes of their own. There were two facts which ought not to be forgotten—the one was that Englishmen of all parties admitted that the Irish people were labouring under great and extraordinary grievances; the other was that they had been for years seeking in vain for the redress of those grievances. After they had been for years tolerating, if not conniving at, the proceedings of those unhappy men in Ireland, when even at the verge of rebellion, it was, to say the least, the grossest inconsistency on their part to turn suddenly round and seize them with the grasp of despotism. The course of treatment pursued towards those Irish political prisoners was, in his opinion, discreditable to the people of England, and he knew that it had created a feeling of great exasperation in Ireland. No person could have been so foolish as to think that those political offenders could escape punishment; but it was the general impression that the treatment dealt out to them would be governed by those magnanimous sentiments which had been so often expressed in that House by British statesmen when administering advice to foreign Governments in respect to their political prisoners, or when condoling with the sufferings of men who had been goaded to insurrection by persecution or misgovernment. The Irish political prisoners were treated in a manner worse than the political prisoners of any other country. Their heads were shaved—they were chained together—they were clothed in convict's dress to degrade them to the dust—they were subjected to the poorest diet upon which it was scarcely possible to support existence—they were exposed to the most wanton cruelties and indignities in order to brand with infamy a cause which an immense mass of his countrymen were devoted to. There was an aspect of vindictiveness in their treatment, which engendered a fearful spirit in the hearts of their sympathisers in Ireland; and until the state of that country was very different from what it then was, he believed that they would persist in regarding these unhappy prisoners—no matter what Englishmen said or did in respect to them—as true patriots and as men deserving of their best commiseration. He hoped that the Motion of his hon. Friend would be assented to, and that those unfortunate prisoners would be soon relieved from their present deplorable condition.

MR. O'BEIRNE said, he should support the Motion, and thought that the question was one that must commend itself to the good feeling of every hon. Gentleman. He appealed to the House to stand between these unfortunate men and the tyranny of the persons into whose hands they had fallen. The question was one which involved the very heart and soul of justice in this country. It was impossible to contemplate without horror the details laid before them, and he could only hope that they were over-coloured.

MR. SYNAN said, that whilst expressing his strongest condemnation of the Fenian movement, he considered that the present question was one which involved the principles of British justice and British honour. He hoped the Secretary of State would, if unable to refute the statements of the hon. Member for Cork, put an end to the abominable treatment to which these unfortunate men had been subjected.

SIR JOHN GRAY said, he had read with much pain the published statements as to the cruel indignities inflicted on the Fenian prisoners, and having taken some trouble to ascertain if the allegations were true, he was reluctantly compelled to arrive at the conclusion that the statements laid before the House by the hon. Member for Cork were in accordance with the facts. He confidently hoped that the House would draw a line between the Fenian who was at large inciting to revolt, and the prisoner handed over to the custody of English officials. With the Fenians active in conspiracy this House could hold no parley, and could have no sympathy. He (Sir John Gray) had no sympathy with, and always publicly condemned their objects, their motives, and their courses. But he drew a broad distinction between the man who was at large, stimulating to reckless and hopeless revolution, and the unhappy man who, because of his illegal courses, had passed into the custody of the Executive of these kingdoms. That was, he conceived, a distinction which this House would recognise. It was one in strict accord with the constitution, the tendency of legislation, and the humane spirit of English gentlemen. The convicted prisoner was under the protection of the law, and this House was bound to see that the sentence of the law was carried out with humanity, and that no petty tyranny, no spirit of revenge for the past, no small persecutions irritating and galling to the unfortunate, and discreditable to the Empire were indulged in by the officers of the law. He (Sir John Gray) had satisfied himself that the chief facts brought under the notice of the House by the Member for Cork were substantially accurate. He conceived that the moment a man was sentenced, that instant the outlaw of the previous day passed under the guardianship of law, and had a claim upon the humanity of every high-minded citizen. The past history, the past misconduct, the past errors of these men were all wrapped up and buried in their sentences, and all prejudice should cease the moment they came within the purview of the Executive to receive their punishment. He (Sir John Gray) had ascertained that men of as refined tastes and as cultivated intellects as many Members of that House, were treated with the most cruel and insulting indignities. They were compelled to perform for others the menial, degrading, the physically offensive and unmentionable offices described by the hon. Member for Cork, and this treatment indicated that vengeance and degradation, and official tyranny were in full force against those unhappy men. Surely that was neither manly nor English, and would that be defended by the Government or sanctioned by the House. Certain duties, such as he indicated, might without any cruelty be assigned to a class of prisoners whose previous lives and habits rendered them familiar with such functions; but it was a refinement on cruelty to assign such duties to men of taste and of highly-cultivated minds. He had ascertained that some of these prisoners were confined for ten, fifteen, and twenty days in miserable dark cells—that their letters to their wives were read and misrepresented to the damage of their characters, and their dishonour as men. Some of them were punished by being put on bread and water diet for weeks in succession, being supplied with one pint of water at five in the morning and a similar quantity at five in the evening. [Laughter.] He (Sir John Gray) hoped he would not be misinterpreting that laugh if he accepted it as a laugh of incredulity, and an indication from men of manly English hearts that they believed it impossible that any English official would treat a political prisoner with such severity. He (Sir John Gray) was certain the Government, whose Members were men of high honour and generous feelings, would not stoop to persecute or take vengeance on men who had fallen into their hands. He was certain no English gentlemen would do it—and, above all, he felt that this House—Members on all sides of this House—representing as it does the gentlemanly spirit, the conscience, the heart, and humanity of the great English people, would not sanction such proceedings. The whole tendency of the recent legislation of this Empire in criminal matters was to humanize punishment and adapt it to the nature of the crime and the character of the offender. In such an aspect the mental character of the offender and his antecedent habits were as important elements for consideration as his physical condition, and the mental character of these men rendered a punishment, which had no degradation for another class, the most bitter cruelty to them. The object of punishment ought to be to deter others from following the courses that procured its infliction. The substitution of revenge and petty persecution for just and rational punishment would exalt these men into heroes. The Executive, if it did not at once terminate these indignities, would be responsible for the creation of a species of hero worship in Ireland, for these men and for the cause in which they suffered persecution, not punishment. With a spirited people, like the Irish people, the result would be to spread and to extend, not suppress the principles they advocated. He had no sympathy with these men or with their cause. He had, however, sympathy, and this House and the whole English public had sympathy, with suffering humanity, and he hoped, therefore, for an assurance from the Government that a more just and enlightened system of treatment would be henceforth adopted towards men who were not now rebels and outcasts, but men under the protection of the law and of this House.

LORD NAAS: I rise because if my right hon. Friend (Mr. Walpole) were to address the House upon this question, it would prevent him, by the rules of the House, from again speaking on the Resolution of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bright). When that opportunity arises, he will be prepared to show that a great many of the statements which have been made by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Maguire) are most grossly exaggerated; and he will be able to make, on the authority of the managers and directors of the prisons, explanations which will be satisfactory to the House. One statement made by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cork having reference to Ireland I am, however, bound to notice. He stated that the flannels of some of these prisoners had been taken from them in Mountjoy Prison. I hold in my hand a Report from the Director of Convict Prisons in Ireland, and he says—

“I perceive in a letter, appearing in the newspapers and declared to be written from an English convict prison by one of the persons convicted of treason felony in Ireland last year, a statement that the flannels of those prisoners were taken from them during their detention in the Mountjoy Convict Prison after conviction. I think it my duty to report that the statement is a deliberate falsehood. Such clothes as the convicted political prisoners wore during the day were removed from their cells at night, as a measure of precaution; the clothes were searched, and each man's suit returned to him in the morning. Convicts in Ireland who have been accustomed to wear flannels are always supplied with them, unless the medical officer shall consider their use unnecessary. The supplying of flannels to those who have not been accustomed to wear them is a matter entirely at the option of the medical officer.”

I could not hear the statement the hon. Member made without taking the earliest opportunity of giving it the most complete contradiction. As far as my knowledge goes of the treatment of prisoners while they remain in those gaols for the management of which I am responsible, no hardship, nothing approaching to cruelty or ill-treatment, has ever taken place; and I believe that the statements made with regard to the Dublin prison are wholly without foundation. Whether the law of this country ought or ought not to make a difference with regard to the treatment of political prisoners and those convicted of other offences is a much larger question, and is one that ought not to be discussed and decided on an occasion of this kind. So far as I know the treatment of political prisoners in Ireland has been strictly in conformity with the law. If it be thought desirable that the law in this respect should be altered, the House ought to be asked to do it, and not the Executive Government on its own responsibility be asked to make such changes. It is a question worthy the consideration of the House, or, at all events, one on which the opinion of the House might be asked. The Government have only acted in this matter in strict accordance with the law.

PROPOSED REFORM MEETING IN HYDE PARK—INTERFERENCE OF THE GOVERNMENT.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. BRIGHT: I rise, Sir, to call the attention of the House to the proposed interference of the Government with the public meeting in Hyde Park on Monday next. After the questions which were put to the Secretary of State at the commencement of the evening, and the answers that he gave to those questions, I was a little doubtful whether there was any necessity for my bringing the question of which I had given notice in a more direct form before the House. But on further consideration and consultation with some of my Friends, it has been thought better to have something more said about a question which at this moment is exciting great interest in London, and, from what transpired during this evening, it would appear some alarm. I hope that the alarm outside this House is very much less than that which has been manifested within. The Notice as it is printed in the Paper states that I am about to call the attention of the House to the proposed interference of the Government with the public meeting in Hyde Park on Monday next. I beg to assure the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole) that I do not rise for the purpose of making any attack upon him, or upon anything that he has done, or of increasing whatever difficulty he may feel in dealing with the question. In looking at the question as one of legality and right, I shall not undertake to say whether the people—the members of the Reform League and others who propose to hold a meeting in the Park—are acting with strict legality or not. Nor shall I undertake to declare my opinion whether the Government have a right to permit or to forbid the holding of meetings in the Park. I should say from the Notice which the right hon. Gentleman gave last night of the introduction of a Bill to define the powers of the Government with regard to the Royal Parks, that he himself, and his Colleagues with him, are not by any means satisfied as to the clearness of the title by which they act in preventing the holding of meetings in the Park. I think the introduction of that Bill creates that opinion in the House, as it has, no doubt, created it in the minds of the public. I will presume that the Government has—if anybody has—a right to close the Park—that it has the right to close the Park on any day, and on any occasion. But that right is one which must be exercised as other rights must be exercised, in accordance with the public interests and for the public good. It is quite clear, that although technically and legally the Government may have the right to close the Park, yet practically it has no such right in regard to the ordinary and common enjoyment of it. The Government really dare not attempt to close the Park on any frivolous pretence merely because it happened to please themselves, if the matter were one in which the public took no great interest. Therefore the right, if there be such a right, to close the Park absolutely any day is a right practically of no effect. It is incomplete, is not intended to be exercised, and never has been exercised. Nothing can be more clear than this—and if the right hon. Gentleman would be very candid, as he generally is in his statements to the House, he would say—it is not illegal for any number of persons, on Monday next, to enter Hyde Park. He would admit, further, that when they are in the Park it is not illegal that they should stand shoulder to shoulder, or, if they were numerous, even in a dense multitude. He would say, further, it is not illegal for a man to speak in a loud voice in the Park. We shall have an opportunity of hearing the right hon. Gentleman's opinion, and I am sure he will not say that it is not legal for those present in the Park to listen to what is said. My impression is, that the Government will act upon the opinion I have now expressed, and will say that none of these things I have described are illegal, and that altogether as one act they are not illegal. But it may be said, and with a certain show of reason, that a great meeting amidst a great population may be attended with—or may sometimes be attended with—danger to the public peace; and that therefore it is the business of the Government, and of the Home Office, to exercise some oversight in a matter of this kind when the public peace is menaced. That is a doctrine that many persons I know in this House hold; but they are very timid. I always notice one section of it particularly timid—I mean the Gentlemen opposite below the gangway. The timidity is not on the Treasury Bench, or with the Gentlemen that sit behind that Bench. They seem to have some confidence in the occupants of that Bench. The timidity as I have indicated, is at this end of the House, where there seems to be a great clamour on any occasion of this kind, as if some fearful danger were going to assail the country. If hon. Members had been bred in Paris there might be some reason for apprehending these dangers. In Paris these occasions are not thought desirable. Once there was a banquet announced to take place there. It was thought perilous and did not happen. Peril came from it. Thus men might learn a lesson from the transactions that happened in other countries. Where English people, English blood, and English speaking people are found—whether in our colonies, in the United States, or in the United Kingdom—great meetings have never been found productive of breaches of the peace. I defy you to find anything in history to show that, as a rule, great public meetings have been attended with breaches of the peace in this country. One of the most signal instances of a breach of the peace was in 1819, in Manchester, where men met to ask for Reform and for a repeal of the Corn Laws. If there had been no interference with that meeting it would have been as tranquil as we are in this House at this moment. But because it was interfered with by blind, bigoted, foolish magistrates, whose conduct now every man in the county of Lancaster is ready to condemn, there was a breach of the peace and bloodshed. But it was on the part of the Yeomanry not on that of the people. The result of that transaction has left to this hour feelings of animosity rankling in the minds of not a few of the people of that great district. If what I have said with regard to the question of legality be true, as I believe it is, I am also forced to say that the course taken by the Government last year was, I believe, not only an unwise course, but an illegal course. It was also an unnecessary course and led to any disturbance that occurred. If the Government had acted as I am persuaded they will act now, you would have found the meeting in the month of July last would have passed off just as tranquilly as 999 meetings out of every 1,000 have passed off in the history of this country. A Proclamation—or not exactly a Proclamation, but a notification has been issued by the Secretary of State. After stating in this notification that the use of the parks for the purpose of having such meetings is not permitted as it interferes with the object of Her Majesty in opening the parks for the enjoyment of the people, he goes on to warn the people not to attend. I have great sympathy with persons who enjoy the parks, though unfortunately I find my way there very seldom. I do not know how many persons will be in the Park on Monday at the meeting at six o'clock apart from those who will attend that meeting. If I said 5,000 it might be beyond the mark. But if 100,000 persons, citizens of this metropolis, are anxious to meet in this Park for two hours, it would be no great sacrifice on the part of these other visitors to it. Their enjoyment would not necessarily be interfered with. The true object of opening the parks to the public would not be endangered or injured in any way by permitting 50,000 or 100,000 persons to meet there and express their opinions on a great public question. We in this House are occupied almost from night to night on this question of the Reform Bill. No question of greater importance can be submitted to us. We are making the future history, and deciding the future condition of a great Empire. We are exhorted to put aside all party feeling, and those motives which excite contests here, that we may devote every power of our understanding and all our patriotism for the purpose of arranging this measure in a manner satisfactory to a great people, and finally to settle a question that has been a matter of contest for many years. Who are the people that have the greatest, or at least as great, an interest as any in this question? Surely the unenfranchised thousands who live in this metropolis and in other parts of the country. If they had not a natural and intense feeling on this question you would not now be endeavouring to legislate upon it. If they have a very intense feeling upon it, it is a reasonable thing to expect that they should wish to meet and proclaim to the country—their sense it may be of gratitude to Parliament for the interest we are taking in the question; it may be to explain their opinions on certain points of the measure; it may be to offer counsel to the Government and to the House how to settle the question on sure and permanent foundations. I take the liberty of asserting that a meeting of this nature, whether in London or in any great town—in a crisis of this nature, if I may use the phrase—is an important and useful event. We have had such meetings all over the country. They have been going on since you threw out the Bill last year, and will not cease until the measure before the House, or some other measure for the same object, shall pass both Houses of Parliament and receive the assent of the Queen. What has taken place? I want to show that these fears are without foundation. I was in Birmingham the other day, and I was there in August or September, when the whole town appeared to turn out. There was no special constable to keep the peace. The Mayor and the Mayor of last year joined in the procession. The head of the police helped to marshal the procession. There was a unanimous feeling on the part of every class in the town—the public, the corporation, many of the magistrates, the police guardians of the public peace, with regard to this question. The meeting was held, and by competent authorities judged to have contained, from its centre to its circumference, not many fewer, if any fewer, than 300,000 persons. ["Dis-sent."] I will say this, at any rate, that I believe the number of persons was very much larger than has been ever yet assembled in any park in London at a political meeting, and it may be greater than will be assembled in Hyde Park at any time during this Session. If I ask my hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Forster) what was done in the West Riding, he will give the same account. There was a meeting there with a sufficient number of men from twenty towns to have formed twenty meetings. If I ask my hon. Friends the Members for Glasgow, they would state that in the autumn of last year an incredible number assembled on the green at Glasgow. If I ask my hon. Friend and Relative the Member for Edinburgh, he would tell me what he saw in the Queen's Park in Edinburgh. If these meetings have been held without a breach of the peace; if none of the persons in these towns apprehended a breach of the peace, why, in the name of common sense, when a proposition is made to hold a meeting in Hyde Park, worry the Home Secretary as if the city were about to be sacked by a foreign enemy? If meetings have been held of the people of Birmingham at Brookfields; of the people of Glasgow in Glasgow Park; of the people of Leeds at Woodhouse Moor; of the people of Edinburgh in the Queen's Park—which, I believe, is more absolutely at the disposal of the Crown than any other—why, I ask, is there this terror of a meeting in Hyde Park? Why is this insult offered—for it is an insult—to a great many people of this metropolis to suppose that they cannot meet on an occasion like this without inspiring fears in the minds of men on whom on ordinary occasions cowardice is the last passion that would operate? I was sorry to hear that some have asked that there would be special constables enrolled on Monday next. I believe that this scheme has originated with a few lawyers. A friend of mine said the proposal was carried about in a court where he was the other day, and that some persons signed it. I am sorry to find wigs and gowns with so little courage and so little wisdom. I would say that, to enrol the middle class if you please or any class as special constables with a view of arresting the meeting, or of dispersing it, or with the view of putting them in an attitude of defiance or menace, in opposition to a great meeting like that intended to be held on Monday, would be one of the most insane things that any Home Secretary or magistrate could do. It would be setting class against class with a vengeance. It would be widening the breach which the legislation of this House during this Session, if it be wisely terminated, will in all probability fill up for ever. Neither is it a case for the military at all. Nobody dreams of it out of the House. It is not a case for police, except that the police in this great city should in a body co-operate with all persons anxious to keep the peace and put down any disturbance that might arise. I am confident myself, that the police, united with the many thousands of honourable men who may take part in the proceedings of Monday, would find their labour very light, and their duties more formal than real. What is the duty of the Government in this matter? It is not a question that can be settled very wisely by legal quibbles and technicalities. I hold the duty of the Government to be this. To offer no kind of opposition to the peaceful entrance of the people into the Park, and when they are in the Park, to take no part whatever in endeavouring to prevent what I believe will be the legal proceedings of the day—the intended proceedings of the day. To have no thought whatever of judging of that meeting in any other way or in any other spirit than the police all over the country have judged of the meetings that have been held throughout the country. I maintain, contrary to the feelings of some, that the character of the English people is guarantee for a peaceful issue on a day like that. In Birmingham, Leeds, Glasgow, Edinburgh,

Newcastle, and Manchester you can have these great meetings. It is quite impossible that there should be that difference between the temper of the people of the metropolis and the temper of the people in other great cities of the country—that while those in the country are perfectly harmless, those held in the metropolis are to be eminently hazardous and dangerous. In a meeting like this the people have a great national object connected immediately and directly with their class, and with measures now being discussed in this House. They will go there ennobled by the sentiments which animate them, and you may have a double reliance upon them that there will be nothing done about which any of their countrymen may be ashamed. I hear hon. Gentlemen sometimes speak of the President of the Reform League with feelings akin to contempt. I have gone through a deal of that. I have known hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House use strong language of me in public—I say nothing of what is said in private. Sometimes that language has been used to my face in this House, but oftener when I have not been present. There has been language of terrible abuse for my dangerous views in one year. I find them next year embodying those views in an Act of Parliament. I venture to say this of Mr. Beales—that there has never been connected with any political agitation in our time a more honourable man than he is. I judge from many years' personal, and some years' rather intimate acquaintance with him. I judge from what all those who know him best say of him, and I judge from the general conduct which he has pursued during the last two years when he has been prominent before the public in connection with a great agitation. He has suffered from that connection. He has been cut off from an honourable office; but he stands upon the principles which he holds, and he endeavours to move in their direction legally and morally. He has now, as I know, the intense satisfaction of knowing that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his Colleagues are gradually dragging—it may be drawing, inviting, alluring, coaxing, coercing, or bringing in some way or other—the great Conservative party of England into intimate alliance with him. Sir, let me say this of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary (Mr. Walpole.) I believe there is no man who ever filled the office which he does who was more anxious to perform its duties with moderation and with justice in all questions of the nature which I am now introducing to the House than he is. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman regretted the momentary turmoil that took place last year as much as I did, or any one of us did. I believe now he will now act upon a wiser principle. That he will believe, as I believe, that almost every man who goes to this meeting in Hyde Park will consider himself the guardian of public liberty, and at the same time the protector of the public property. I shall be much surprised if there be harm done to anything within the Park. I believe this at any rate, that the character of the English people for a love of order will not be tarnished by the transactions of that day. Sir, when I look at the difficulties of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who has so much labour with the contending parties of this House in connection with the Bill he has introduced, I say it ought to strengthen his hands, and to be to him and to every man in favour of a settlement of this grand question, a pleasurable fact that there are millions of the metropolis of this Empire who can meet calmly, if not to discuss, at least to consider, the great question in which they are so much interested, and to lend their powerful aid to the attempts which are now made to introduce a large portion of the people to the privileges of our ancient and noble Constitution. I say that it is the business of the House and of the Government not to criticize this question too narrowly in a great emergency like this. The Law Officers of the Crown ought not to try and find a flaw in the claim of the people to meet in Hyde Park. They ought to be above quibbles of that nature. Let them rather consider the grandeur of the question and the grandeur of the hour. Let them consider the intense interests of the people. Let them consider that they are laying the foundation for future legislation and government. Then they will be thankful that there is a love of the Constitution strong enough, a love of order strong enough to enable this immense body of people to meet in their tens, twenties, or hundreds of thousands, for the purpose of peacefully assisting Parliament to arrive at an adjustment of this question. [Laughter.] I was just about to conclude, but the laugh of hon. Gentlemen will induce me to add another sentence. Is there a man among you, if so let him get up when I sit down and say so—is there a man among you who does not feel that he would not be in the position in which he now stands with respect to this great Bill if it had not been for the assistance of those great demonstrations of public opinion? [Laughter.] Why, Sir, the thing is notorious, and if there be any man incapable of seeing it I shall not waste my time and the time of the House in discussing the point. I say such are the obstacles in the way of a very great measure like this, that it cannot be adjusted without the assistance of that great body of the people who hold these meetings—holding them for a noble purpose—[“Oh, oh!”]—for it is a noble purpose, and I trust that the Parliament of England will regard it in that spirit.

MR. NEATE said, that it was lest the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole) should be over-persuaded by the eloquence of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down that he rose at that early period. The hon. Member had praised the Government for their moderation; but he (Mr. Neate) thought the Government were entitled to something more from the Opposition side of the House, and that was cordial thanks for the course they had so wisely taken, and which he hoped they would persevere in. He did not come there to throw down the gauntlet to the working men. Nothing was farther from his intention than to take such an aggressive course. If there had been anything of aggression, it had not been on the part either of Parliament or the Government. He must say that looking to the character of this agitation, it was difficult to conceive anything more unprovoked or more wanton than the shape which it had assumed during the last two months. If, indeed, Her Majesty's Government had endeavoured to disappoint the just expectations of the people by the introduction of a little Reform Bill, if they had proposed to reduce the borough franchise to £9 and the county franchise to £25; if they had rested at the resting-place, which by their own fault they lost last year, of an £8 franchise in the boroughs and a £20 franchise in the counties, he could understand that there would have been cause for a resentful agitation. But the Government had offered a measure which was more liberal than those who claimed to represent the working classes had been willing to accept, and more extensive than the measure of last year. Except, then, for the mere love of agitation—except for the purpose of keeping up a sort of Parliament in the streets, he could not conceive anything which could induce the leaders of this movement to persevere in the course on which they had entered. The mode in which the House of Commons and the Government had dealt with this matter had been marked by singular forbearance. In that House they had taken no notice of the many unmerited insults which had been heaped upon them, and they had shown more than kindness to these agitators. Not only had there been a procession on the 3rd of December, to which the police lent their assistance, and for which the Government offered the use of Primrose Hill; but there had been—he trusted there would be no permanent allowance of any such right—weekly meetings permitted in Trafalgar Square. These agitators, however, had not allowed the Government any resting-place, but had themselves brought the question to an issue. It must now be determined whether any number of people without any legal character or authority could take to themselves the right on any pretext to meet in any of the open places of the metropolis. If the Government conceded any such claim as that, so far from deserving the support of the House, they would deserve to be impeached. If there was any legal question in dispute, the proper course was to let it be tried. But there was in reality no such question. Nobody who had ever talked with a lawyer, or who had a lawyer among his acquaintance, still less any lawyer could suppose that there was any doubt in the matter. There might, indeed, be a right of way through the Park. On that point he apprehended that they would have some information. But a right of way, if such existed, did not carry with it the right to hold a meeting any more than the right of way down Piccadilly implied the right of holding a meeting in the middle of the thoroughfare. Although the Crown might have granted the public a qualified right of way that right was confined to going through the Park. It was quite open to the woods and forests to say that they would grow hay in the Park, and that nobody should be allowed to trespass by walking on the grass. [“No, no!”] A very similar question was raised before the Select Committee on Commons. It was there proved that people had not, as had been supposed, the right of walking up and down and round a common, but merely that of going through it to the point which they wished to reach.

That was the extent of the right of the public in the case of the parks. A right to pass through, not to trespass. It was said, however, that although there was no legal title to hold the meeting, it would have been wise to permit it. That might have been the case had permission been asked; but when a right was asserted, the matter assumed a different aspect. He agreed with his hon. Friend that such permission might have been granted in this instance without danger to the peace of the metropolis. But the House must look not to the present temper of the people, and to the degree of excitement which prevailed respecting the very moderate differences of opinion which now engaged public attention, but to what might happen on an occasion when greater excitement existed. His hon. Friend had cited the example of Birmingham and Manchester, and had said why not allow here what was done at Birmingham, where the Mayor and a great number of the leading inhabitants showed their pleasure and satisfaction at such a meeting being held? and where they attended, he presumed, in order to have the pleasure of listening to his hon. Friend. But the leading authorities and inhabitants here, including those who used the Park for its legitimate purpose of recreation, did not wish for such a meeting. Therefore the example of Birmingham did not apply. His hon. Friend, judging partly from himself, and partly from those that had listened to him, contended that nothing but good could result from such a gathering. There might arise, however, other demagogues. [Laughter.] He hoped it would not be supposed that he intended to speak of the hon. Gentleman as a demagogue, though he did not see why the word should be deemed offensive, for it simply meant "a leader of the people;" but he should be the last to apply any term in the slightest degree disparaging to the relations which subsisted between his hon. Friend and the people, which redounded to the honour of both. But other leaders of the people might arise possessing equal power of stirring up their passions, but not possessing to the same extent the ability or the inclination to restrain them within those moderate courses which had marked the career of his hon. Friend as a political agitator. The House were bound to consider that contingency; and, while leaving unnoticed the attacks which had been made on their character, they ought to take care that they transmitted undiminished to their successors the power and authority with which they were intrusted. Especially should they do this at a time when they were on the eve of a great extension of the franchise. The more widely the doors of the Constitution were thrown open, the larger the number with whom they came in contact, the mightier the impulses to which the course of legislation was hereafter to be subject, the more important was it that they should transmit to their successors, unimpaired and untarnished, the laws and liberties of the country. Our laws had derived much benefit from our liberties, but the liberty of our country owed still more to its laws. He should esteem them false friends to English liberty who, either by their language or their silence, lent any countenance to the doctrine that the councils of this country and the legislation of the House of Commons were to be controlled by multitudinous assemblages out of doors or by permanent agitation in the streets. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Amendment.

MR. J. HARDY seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "Her Majesty's Government, in refusing the use of Hyde Park for the purpose of holding a Political Meeting, have asserted the legal right of the Crown, and deserve the support of this House in so doing,"—(Mr. Neate,)

—instead thereof.

MR. DAVENPORT-BROMLEY said, he was glad to find that the hon. Member (Mr. Bright) took a pacific view of the proceedings of Monday next, since there had been prophets in that House who had prophesied evil and who had been very influential in carrying out their own prophecies. He must say that that remark was applicable both with regard to the hon. Gentleman and to the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone). The conduct of both of them reminded him of a story related by an eminent Member of the House (Mr. Arthur Kinglake) in one of the cleverest books ever written on the East. He described the behaviour of a certain prophet, who predicted that there would be a great plunder of the Jewish quarter of a particular Eastern town. On the day which he had fixed for the event he went among the crowd, created a tumult, and led them to the Jewish quarter, which they accordingly plundered. He indulged in a second prophecy of the same kind, but with that the law interfered, because he was regarded as too practical a prophet to be allowed to continue his prognostications. The hon. Member, however, had confined himself to stating his confidence that peace would be preserved inside the Park, and had said nothing whatever about the outside. But that he (Mr. Davenport Bromley) conceived was an equally important matter. He had a friend living near Cumberland Gate who had told him that the whole of his windows and nearly all his furniture were destroyed last July; that he had had the damage repaired at considerable expense; and that he did not look forward to next Monday with any feelings of satisfaction. He was not at all so sanguine as the hon. Member for Birmingham with regard to the peaceable character of the contemplated proceedings. The hon. Gentleman had said a good deal about the late Reform meeting at Birmingham. But he must be well aware that on Easter Monday there was invariably a vast crowd of people in Birmingham, and that the fact of the recent meeting being held on Easter Monday must be taken into consideration. The hon. Gentleman had also stated that hon. Members on the Ministerial side of the House—whom he, perhaps, regarded as less likely to have received an historical education than those on the opposite Benches—could not appeal to history for instances of the peace having been broken by meetings of this character. He surely ought to have remembered the Bristol riots, the Lord George Gordon riots, the Nottingham riots, and several other instances which might be mentioned, not forgetting the Hyde Park riots of last July. He believed the Government would not adopt an unwise course, or take an ostensible line of opposition in any direction. At the same time, he trusted that if any infraction of the law took place, they would take care to hold the leaders of the demonstration responsible for any injury to person or property which might unfortunately occur.

MR. THOMAS HUGHES: I wish to take the earliest opportunity open to me of making a few observations in reference to the questions asked early in the evening by the hon. Baronet (Sir Charles

Russell) in which he introduced my name and the names of other hon. Members on this side of the House. I do so because I hold it to be right, and the duty of the House, to scrutinize the conduct of its Members outside its walls. Some eighteen months ago, to begin at the beginning, some artizans whom I had known for some time, and for whom I had a great respect, called on me, and asked me to subscribe to the Reform League, of which they were themselves members. I subscribed to the funds, and, without further solicitation, I was made a Vice President of the League. Since that time whatever responsibilities or advantages may attach to that office have attached to me, and do so still. From many of the doctrines and most of the action of the Reform League I have differed widely. I have taken public occasion to state those differences; but I am not aware that the council of the Reform League have felt it to be their duty to alter their course of action in consequence of those views and opinions of mine. Admitting all this, I see and know nevertheless, as has been stated by the hon. Member (Mr. Bright), that but for the action of the Reform League, and the agitation that has been created by it and other similar bodies, we should not be where we are with respect to this question. I hold that the conversion of hon. Gentlemen opposite to the doctrine of household suffrage is, in a very great degree, owing to the agitation of the Reform League. I have been urged by many persons to give up my office as Vice President of the League. I have been urged to do so by persons whose judgment I highly respect, and whose good opinion I feel anxious to retain. But, after the best consideration I could give to the case, I declined to withdraw. It is not therefore likely that now I should re-consider the question, upon the pressure of the hon. Baronet and of the Gentlemen who think with him, for whose judgment I have not a high respect, and whose good opinion I am not anxious to obtain. It would be an act of simple cowardice and poltroonery if I were at this moment to recede from my position in consequence of the pressure applied to me by political opponents, or by any persons whatever. I apprehend that there are hardly any Members of this House who do not subscribe to institutions over whose actions they have no control, and with whose opinions they do not entirely agree. With respect to the proposed meeting in Hyde Park, I can only say that, as a Vice President of the Reform League, I am not in favour of it, and that I have done and shall do what little I can to prevent its occurrence. But, at the same time, let the House and the Government distinctly understand that, whatever may be my opinion upon the subject, if the meeting be held, I shall not shrink from the responsibility which may fall upon me as Vice President of the League; nor do I intend to recede from that position. With respect to the property destroyed last year, the destruction, it must be remembered, was occasioned by the attempt to keep out of Hyde Park the persons who wished to enter it.

MR. WALPOLE: Sir, there was a singular omission in the speech of the hon. Member (Mr. Bright) of the one topic which I should have thought was the most important in the consideration of this question. He was very eloquent and powerful in advocating the holding of public meetings for the purpose of political discussion. The hon. Member pointed out the good which such discussions often produce, and, founding his argument mainly upon that, he advocated the propriety, and almost the right—for he treated the denial of it as an insult to the people—of the admission of the people to the Royal Parks for such purposes. The hon. Gentleman never heard from me, nor do I believe he will hear from any Member of Her Majesty's Government, any expression of an intention to deprecate meetings of that kind. But the strange omission, which could not have escaped the attention of the House, relates to what is the foundation stone of the matter now under consideration—namely, the place where the meeting is to be held, and the propriety of insisting upon a place that is forbidden, when other places are open. That was hardly adverted to, except in two sentences, from the beginning to the end of the otherwise powerful speech of the hon. Gentleman. The whole question before the House at this moment is whether that right—of which Her Majesty's Government have no doubt, and of which I believe, not ten Gentlemen in this House have any doubt—namely, the right of the Crown to the Royal Parks, and as consequent on that right, the power either to permit certain things to be done, or the power to prohibit certain other things from being done—is not as clear as the clearest proposition known to our law. The right of the Crown has been exercised in various ways and at various times. There is an implied permission, consequent on usage for every person to be admitted to the parks—and gladly, willingly, and cheerfully they are admitted—for the purposes of general recreation and enjoyment. The same right is established in many parks in many parts of the country—not Royal Parks, but parks created by the beneficence of individuals, or by public subscription. In almost all these parks they make it a condition—I know they make it a condition in most of them—that they shall not be open for two purposes—namely, purposes either of political or religious discussions. The reason is obvious. These are two topics on which men's minds are easily excited, and on which contrary opinions may be brought to bear in an adverse manner. If you opened the parks for the discussion of one set of opinions, you must open them for that of the other set of opinions. If therefore the Royal Parks were opened for either of these purposes of religious or political discussions the injurious consequences would be so great that not only do I hope, but I firmly believe, that the House will support the Government in maintaining the distinction as a reasonable distinction to be observed. The hon. Member said he wanted to know whether any number of persons had not a right to enter the Park. I concede that to be so. But when the hon. Member goes on to ask whether they have not a right to put shoulder to shoulder, to stand near each other and express their opinions to each other in a somewhat loud voice, I say that the answer to the question must depend upon circumstances. The real fact, and the only question which arises is, not whether any number of persons may enter the Park, or whether any number of persons may even be walking together, but whether any number of persons may hold a public meeting, doing that which is not permitted to be done. He imagines that either the Government or myself must have some doubt as to the rights of the Crown, since we have announced our intention to bring in a Bill on the subject. I do not bring in that Bill because we have the slightest doubt of the rights of the Crown, but because those rights are in our opinion undoubted. The mode of exercising those rights, however, so as to prevent the infraction of the law, or of the right which is conceded, to the persons entering the Park, is not so easy of enforcement. The real truth is that since every one has permission to enter the parks, the holding of public meetings, instead of being a criminal offence, is an act of trespass; and that in dealing with a trespass it is found difficult, indeed impossible, to act immediately when large bodies are collected together. It is easy to enforce the law, and it has often been enforced when small bodies of men have tried to enter upon religious discussions. When preachers go into the Park for this purpose you can stop them and hand them out. If they resist, you can deal with them for a breach of the peace. But another state of circumstances now arises. This being the case, the question is whether the Government, after all that has occurred, were not justified in warning those who announced their intention of holding this meeting in the Park for political discussion that they ought not to hold it, because such meetings were not allowed to be held. That was a warning, I should have thought, which the members of the Reform League might have cheerfully and honourably acted upon. They knew perfectly well, because an intimation was given to them last year by the Government, that if they simply wished to have a meeting for the discussion of the question of Reform in the open air, in order to avoid the expense of an indoor meeting, Primrose Hill was open to them for that purpose. You cannot, therefore, say that it was for the purpose of preventing them from having a meeting that we took the course we did. It was simply to maintain the right which cannot be maintained for the benefit of the public unless the authorities do their utmost to maintain that right, and unless in endeavouring to maintain that right they are supported by Parliament and the country. The question then arises supposing these gentlemen to insist on going to the Park, upon whom will fall the responsibility of any breach of the peace which may arise? They have had their warning, and I think they might even now be advised to take it. No provocation will come from the Government so as to lead to that which is to be deprecated by everybody—the chance of a disturbance or breach of the peace. If they go, as I understand they intend to go, though in a somewhat altered manner from that originally announced—if they go into the Park as other people go into the Park, the gates will not be closed. They will be admitted; but I do hope that when that is done, they will not insist on holding their meeting. I do hope they will pay such respect to the law of the land as to desist from what they must know is contrary to law. They have had every opportunity offered them of trying the legal right. Not only have they declined to accept that offer, but the President of the Reform League himself has said within the last six weeks that the legal right, he admitted, was with the Government. Sir, if this had been only an announcement of a meeting to be held in the Park, it would not have become the Government, in maintaining the rights of the public—for all the people have a right to the enjoyment of the parks—to have stood neutral. But that is not all. I do not wish to say anything to aggravate or increase the difficulties of the present state of things. But I should imperfectly discharge my duty if I did not point out that not only was the meeting announced to be held, but language was used for the purpose of defying the Government and the authorities, which no Government could submit to with due regard to the interests of the country. I hope that language has now been withdrawn; I hope still more that it will not be repeated. In concluding the few observations I have addressed to the House, pointing out the reasons why Her Majesty's Government have felt it their duty to take the course they have done, I cannot but add this further entreaty to those who may be connected with the Reform League. One of the vice-presidents (Mr. Thomas Hughes) has already said that he has tried, and will try to prevent this meeting, though he held himself responsible for what occurred while he remained Vice President. I hope that others will join their voices with his in trying to persuade the League not to do that which is contrary to the law. There is no intention on the part of the Government to prevent them from having the fullest and fairest discussion on the great subject of the day, provided the place where it is held is not a place set apart for other purposes. The rights of the people to the enjoyment of the parks are recognised by the Crown, but those places will never, I hope, be permitted to become areas of political or religious agitations.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I wish to meet, without a moment's delay, so far as I am concerned, the invitation which has been given by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole) to the Members of this House for an expression of opinion with respect to the meeting proposed to be held in Hyde Park on Monday. I will state at the commencement of the few remarks I have to make that I draw, in my own mind, and I desire to make intelligible to the House, a broad distinction between assuming responsibility on the part of this House for any step the Executive Government may take in the exercise of their legal powers, with reference to affirming or questioning the correctness of their judgment—a matter that I take to be beyond the duty of the House—and that which, on the other hand, I think does lie within the duty of the House and of Members of the House—namely, respecting and supporting the authority of the Crown and of the Ministers in the administration of the law. One word, in the first place, in respect to some remarks which have been made in this debate. Nothing could be less desirable than that any difference of opinion should be manifested in this House by a vote on a question touching public law and order. Upon questions of this kind the space that separates the two sides of this House entirely disappears. There can be but one sentiment in any quarter of this House with regard to the paramount importance and sacredness of every interest connected with the maintenance of public order. In the little I have to say I shall endeavour to speak in a spirit conformable to that sentiment. Holding that sentiment, I make this preliminary appeal to my hon. Friend (Mr. Neate) that I trust he will not ask us to go to a vote that must necessarily be misrepresented and misunderstood, relying, as I think he may, upon that substantial union of opinion which I am certain pervades all quarters of the House. I must say that if there be those who question either the lawfulness or the usefulness, in given circumstances, of great assemblies of people for political purposes, I am not among such persons. Moreover, I confess it was with some surprise that I heard expressions of scepticism from some portions of the House when a speaker on this side stated what appears to me entirely beyond dispute, that assemblages of the people for discussion and manifestation of their opinion regarding the question of Reform, have had an important—I will venture to say a vital influence and effect, in bringing that question to its present position. I can conceive nothing more legitimate in general than the principle of such meetings. Nothing less questionable than the propriety of their being brought into use on occasions of this kind where the interests of the people are directly concerned, and where for many years a main allegation in the mouths of its opponents—doubtless a conscientious allegation—was that the people themselves were indifferent to it. Although my hon. Friend (Mr. Neate) has rested his argument on the merits of the Bill introduced by Her Majesty's Ministers, I am not going to rest any counter argument on the demerits of that Bill. But I must say it is very natural that among those who are alive to the advantages and recommendations of that Bill the people of London should not be found in a foremost rank. This is not the time to introduce polemical observations; but whatever may be said as to the advantages contained in it to other parts of the country, there can be no question that the Bill, as regards the population of London, is little more than null. I therefore am not prepared to concur, directly or indirectly, in the slightest censure of the people of London for their continued desire, if they think fit to entertain that desire, to meet and express their views in respect to the question of Reform in Parliament. But, as was said by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Walpole), that is subject to considerations of place. The Government believes itself to be in possession of legal powers to prohibit the use of the parks for the purposes of political discussion. It is a question, I admit, of very nice discretion—whether upon any occasion the extreme right of the Government in such matters should be waived. My right hon. Friend, I think, on certain occasions, if my memory does not deceive me, has himself waived somewhat of that right. I confess it appears to me it might be wise in some circumstances that that right should be waived. I agree cordially with my hon. Friend (Mr. Neate) when he deprecates permanent agitation. I will not say there can be no greater curse to a country. But I will say it is a great public evil, commonly testifying, indeed, to the existence of other and greater evils, but yet in itself a great public evil. But the way to get rid of these evils is by just legislation. However, I am now only drawing attention to the difference between a permanent cession of a right and an occasional waiver under circumstances that would justify such an exercise of discretion on the part of the Government. If the right hon. Gentleman has upon former occasions waived somewhat that right, I admit that he and his Colleagues are the proper judges whether that right should be waived under present circumstances. I am not sure whether I have gathered from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman with perfect exactness the intentions of the Government upon this subject. I will, however, state what those intentions are as I understand them. I understand that the right hon. Gentleman holds himself to be beyond all doubt in possession of a legal power to prohibit and to put down meetings for political discussion in the parks. I understand him further to say, and I think this very important, that if other persons differ from the Government in their view of the law, he is not opposed, but, on the contrary, would give every facility for trying the legal right. Under these circumstances, and inviting an appeal to the law, the right hon. Gentleman says to those who propose to hold the meeting in Hyde Park, "I warn you not to attend the Park on Monday, the 6th of May, for the purpose of political discussion. No attempt will be made to close the gates of the Park against the entrance of any one who wishes to go there, but my intention is not to permit political discussion in that place." I understand that to be the intention of the right hon. Gentleman. If I have not correctly defined that intention, perhaps it might be as well if he were to say so.

MR. WALPOLE: As this is a very important point, perhaps the House will forgive me for interrupting the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman used the phrase "prohibit and put down." I believe I never uttered the words "put down." On the contrary, I think I explained myself by saying that this was a trespass only. There would not therefore, practically, be power to stop such a meeting, and for that reason I sought by Bill to obtain some further powers to enforce the legal right in a more effectual manner.

MR. GLADSTONE: I must admit that when I read the Proclamation, or document, or notification—call it what you will—published by the right hon. Gentleman, I understood it to be the intention of the right hon. Gentleman to assert the legal right of which he thinks himself possessed by the agency of those who are at his command for that purpose. As the matter stands at present, I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that his intention is limited to interference when any act takes place that involves a breach of the peace.

MR. WALPOLE: I think I never expressed any intention as to what would be done in the event of the meeting being held. What I did say was, that the meeting being prohibited, the parties to it would be trespassers, and might be treated as trespassers. But in treating them as trespassers and in handing them out of the Park, a breach of the peace might easily be committed. This would be one of the consequences that might arise if the meeting were held.

MR. GLADSTONE: I do not doubt that it is owing to defective apprehension on my part that I feel myself to be imperfectly informed by the statement of the right hon. Gentleman as to the course that he intends shall actually be taken in this matter. But if the intention of the right hon. Gentleman be to treat as trespassers, and therefore as persons who have committed a breach of the law, those who engage in political discussion in the Park on Monday next; or I will go further, and say whatever may be the intention of Her Majesty's Government with respect to the administration and execution of the law, my most earnest advice and entreaty to those whom the Proclamation concerns is to conform themselves to the notifications it contains. So much at least of respect is due to the Government as the administrators of the law, that it is not consistent with the duty of the private individual and loyal subject of the Queen—and I agree with every word that the hon. Member (Mr. Bright) has used with regard to the general spirit which pervades the minds of the working population of London, whom I believe to be as jealous of the purity of their loyalty, as any Gentleman in this House—to place himself in conflict with those who are properly responsible for the execution of the law. If any persons question the legality of the powers assumed by the Government, they should carry the matter before the tribunals of the country, where the legal question would be determined. I will only add that, as others may labour under the same defective apprehensions as myself with regard to the intention of the Government on this subject, I hope that as far as the nature of the case admits their intention will be fully and clearly made known to those to whom the Proclamation has been addressed. It may be on my part an undue assumption of authority, to which I have no pretension, to utter any word of advice or recommendation to those who propose to hold this meeting. But be that as it may—exposing myself to misconstruction on that score, but trusting, as every public man in this country may trust, to the generous indulgence of his fellow-countrymen, when in strictness, perhaps, he travels a little beyond his province for the sake of obtaining a great public end—I offer to them in the face of the House the entreaty which I have just uttered. Under these circumstances, I feel confident that the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Neate) will not ask the House to divide upon his Motion. In my opinion it would be a great mistake to press that Motion, and to ask the House to express beforehand, without being fully acquainted with the intentions of the Government, its opinion as to whether the Government had or had not been wisely advised to adopt, in the exercise of its discretion, a particular course. We should certainly have the alternative, if the division were to be taken, of voting that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question; or that the business of the House should go forward in its ordinary course. However, I feel almost confident that we shall not be driven to this alternative. I think I am expressing the sentiments of my right hon. Friend (Mr. Walpole) himself in making this appeal to my hon. and learned Friend. I cannot agree with the observations which have been made by the hon. and learned Member with regard to those who have met in different parts of the country for the purpose of expressing their opinions on the subject of Reform; neither do I share in the apprehensions which some people appear to entertain with regard to any results that may arise from such meetings. But the question before us is one of a totally different description, and it is one in which our duty and obligations are so clear as to be beyond dispute. Let us respect the right and liberty of meeting: let us, if we think fit, reserve to ourselves the right to question the authority assumed by the Government at the right time and at the right place; but, in the meantime, let us support their authority as the administrators of the law for the sake of the law itself and for the sake of the public interest.

MR. WHALLEY said, he had a petition to present from Charles Bradlaugh, a member of the Reform League, praying that notwithstanding the notification of the Home Secretary he might be protected whilst taking part in the public meeting on Monday next. The question with respect to the meeting on Monday next was this, whether under various pretences it was the purpose of the Government to restrict and render more difficult the exercise of the rights of the public. The ground now taken by the Government differed from that taken by them on a former occasion. The ground taken by the Chancellor of the Exchequer last year was that a breach of the peace might be apprehended. The present pretext was that the enjoyment of ordinary visitors to the Park might be interfered with. The reasons were inconsistent, and it was trifling with the question. Personally, he did not approve of the proposed meeting. He could not imagine why these persons could not leave the matter to himself and to others who had protected the cause of Reform on a recent occasion. Still, the point was one upon which the public must be allowed themselves to judge, and the House had therefore no right to interfere on the ground of unreasonableness. Nothing could be more pretentious, more unsound, more fictitious, than the objection raised by the Proclamation of the right hon. Gentleman. Why should it not apply to reviews and other public celebrations? The present discussion was not at all calculated to allay the dissatisfaction which now prevailed. The legal question had been raised, but that had nothing to do with the matter. The Crown had many rights that it would be madness to enforce. The right hon. Gentleman, in dealing with this matter, ought to consider the rights of the public, which were now in danger of being infringed. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman, instead of interfering with the rights of the people, would rather assist them in expressing their opinions.

LORD ELCHO: I had not, Sir, the good fortune to be in the House when the hon. Member (Mr. Bright) made his speech, but can well understand that its purport was somewhat similar to that of speeches made by the hon. Member elsewhere. I heard, however, with great satisfaction the speeches of my right hon. Friends (Mr. Walpole and Mr. Gladstone.) My right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) apologized to a certain extent for holding the opinions which he expressed; but I cannot help regarding that apology as entirely unnecessary, inasmuch as I believe it to be the duty of every well-wisher of his country to assist in maintaining order and peace in the metropolis. I cannot, however, think that this question is at the present moment in a very satisfactory state, and I confess that I was unable to gather from the remarks of my right hon. Friend (Mr. Walpole) the exact position in which the matter at present stands. I remember very well the circumstances of 1848, when my right hon. Friend (Sir George Grey), who was the Home Secretary at that time, must have had considerable experience in connection with this question. I have risen, therefore, for the purpose of asking him to favour the House with some expression of opinion upon this matter, with which his experiences and recollections of 1848 must have made him familiar.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I must say that I do not think the remarks of the noble Lord are warranted, because my right hon. Friend (Mr. Walpole) has told the House what our opinions are with respect to permitting the people to enter Hyde Park. Upon that point I think we fully express the opinions of Her Majesty's Government, while upon the legal points we never entertained the slightest doubt. If the question assumes the form of a simple trespass, then it will be dealt with according to the circumstances. The noble Lord appears to think that my right hon. Friend had not been sufficiently explicit as to the intentions of Her Majesty's Government after the people had entered the Park. It is asked what the Government intend to do after the people shall have entered the Park. What course will be taken must depend on circumstances—upon what takes place in the Park. It is quite impossible to say beforehand what we are going to do with respect to those who attend in the Park. All I can say is that we have taken every precaution for the preservation of the peace, and for preventing any possible inconvenience and injury to the ground in consequence of any accident or disturbance which might possibly arise. Every precaution is taken for the preservation of the public peace. But with respect to our conduct after the people shall have entered the Park, I repeat that that must depend on what takes place. I trust that everything that takes place will be of such a tranquil and ordinary character as to make it unnecessary on the part of the Government to take any steps. But when my right hon. Friend is pressed to state what he will do under circumstances which have not at present occurred, the only answer which can be given is that we have taken precautions which we think adequate to preserve the peace of the metropolis.

give no opinion as to the course which the Government ought to take on this occasion. The circumstances of 1848, which have been referred to, and those of the present time, are very different. There is no question now as to the legality of meetings held for the discussion of questions connected with Reform, and the only question is as to where those meetings should take place. I think, however, that there is some obscurity remaining as to the course which the Government intend to take. It is not an unreasonable assumption that the persons who do go to the Park on Monday will go with the intention of holding a meeting in defiance of the notice which has been issued. This I apprehend they have no right to do, inasmuch as the Park is a place which is only opened to the public subject to certain restrictions imposed by the Crown in the interest and for the benefit of the public. If persons, with the view of asserting what they conceive to be their legal rights, should attempt to hold a meeting in the Park—though I trust they will not do so—I think that they should distinctly know beforehand what course the Government intend to take. I must, however, express my earnest hope that, after the discussion of this evening, the general expression of opinion as to the right of the Government to prohibit meetings in the parks, and the advice which has been so earnestly tendered by many Members of the House, the members of the League will abstain from doing that which must put them in the wrong.

CAPTAIN HAYTER said, he wished to know whether it was the intention of the Government to bring up a special force of cavalry and infantry to prevent the people from going into the Park, in the event of there being a procession, with banners, with the obvious intention of holding a meeting in the Park. If the people were once allowed to enter the Park, then the difficulty would arise of driving them out again, and the utmost danger might result, not only to property but to person. On the former occasion of a meeting in Hyde Park an hon. Member had his house actually entered; several gentlemen had all their windows broken, and the son of a right hon. Gentleman on the Ministerial side of the House nearly lost his life. Therefore, he wished to know whether the Home Secretary meant to have a sufficient force of military ready to prevent the people from entering the Park?

MR. OTWAY said, that he had already expressed an opinion that Hyde Park was not at all a suitable place for holding political meetings, and he therefore had no sympathy with those who intended to hold a political meeting in that place. He understood the Home Secretary to say that the persons whose intention was to hold a meeting in the Park would be allowed to enter. But what he wanted to know was, when those persons proceeded to commence a political discussion, whether the Government meant to take forcible means to eject them, or whether they would be allowed to continue the discussion? It would depend on the course adopted by the Government whether the whole affair passed off peaceably, or whether it led to the breach of the peace.

MR. SELWYN said, that he was a special constable in 1848, and he was ready to serve again in that capacity. He could not concur in the statement of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir George Grey) as to the great difference between the circumstances of that time and the circumstances of the present time. If anything, they were more serious now. The question did not relate to the right of public meetings for political discussion, for that was conceded on all hands. Neither was it a question as to the convenience of the place of meeting, for, having regard to the situation of the residences of most of the persons likely to attend, and to its own shape and position, Primrose Hill would be a much more convenient place for the purpose of the meeting, and there was not the same likelihood of damage being inflicted upon the houses in the neighbourhood as was the case in Hyde Park. Primrose Hill had been offered more than once, and there could be no doubt that Hyde Park had been chosen as the place of meeting simply for the purpose of intimidation. There was no question at all as to the point of law. Even the hon. Member (Mr. Bright) did not assert that the people had any legal right to meet in the parks. Every one had permission from the Crown to go into the parks at certain times and for certain purposes, and this permission could give no greater right than every one had to walk up and down a street in front of a man's house; but if a number of people were to give notice that they intended to hold a meeting in the street in front of a certain house, and were warned by the police against doing it, as it would interfere with the proper use and enjoyment of the thoroughfare by others for other purposes, and would therefore be unlawful; and if, notwithstanding these warnings, the people insisted on their right to hold the meeting, it would be exactly the question which was raised in this case. He did not think it would be right for the Government to say in precise terms what they would do in case of any particular event occurring. He agreed with what had fallen from the Chancellor of the Exchequer—that their course must be guided by circumstances. Considering that the legal question was free from doubt, that the right of public discussion was fully conceded, and believing that if the meeting were held as proposed it would be in direct defiance of the law and for the purpose of intimidation, he held it to be the duty of every Member of that House to give to the Government his utmost support on this question, as their cause was alike the cause of true liberty, the cause of law, and the cause of order.

MR. DENMAN said, that he was also ready to serve again as a special constable in defence of law and order—as he had under the command of his hon. and learned Friend in April, 1848—if necessary. But in reference to the matter under discussion, he was of opinion that the intentions of the Government should be made a little clearer. If any of the persons who went to the Park on Monday should get up and commence an address to his fellows on some political subject, would he be turned out of the Park? The intentions of the Government on that head had not yet been put before the House point-blank, and he thought that they ought to be clearly understood, or many of the persons attending in the Park, when they found that political topics were not allowed to be discussed, would complain that they had been made fools of, and a disturbance might arise. The Proclamation which had been issued left it quite doubtful whether the Government intended to prevent any discussion or not. Would persons acting in the way described be turned out of the Park? If that were properly known and understood, it would have the effect of preventing a great many people from going there. If it were not stated beforehand, and people went to the Park under the impression that they would not be interfered with, and then were turned out, they would be much more likely to get into a state of temper in which a disturbance was likely to happen. If a disturbance occurred in consequence of any violation of the law, he quite agreed that the Government ought not now to be called upon to explain what they would do in that event; but he thought it was only right and fair that a distinct answer should be given to the question of whether, if Mr. Beales or Mr. Bradlaugh attempted to get up a political discussion in spite of the warning of the Government, they would be taken into custody by the police?

MR. KINNAIRD said, that he had received a communication from Perth, strongly urging him to state to the House that they took a deep interest in the question, and that they considered the proposed political meeting might be fairly held in Hyde Park on Monday next. He did not express any opinion upon it himself; but he thought it should be known that there was a strong feeling in the country upon the question, as it was considered to be one which affected the right of meeting in public places.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR said, he could not let pass without observation the statement that the House was unanimous in denying the right of the people to hold meetings in the Park. For his part, he held that the people were distinctly in the right in holding their meetings, so long as they were peaceful and orderly meetings; and—however little his opinion might be worth—this was at least important to understand—namely, that the people thought so too—that therefore they could not be said to be acting with the desire to deliberately defy the Government, but simply to exercise what they believed to be an undoubted right. Now, he must say that no ground whatever was, in his opinion, made out for the alleged illegality. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole) from time to time used the phrase “Royal Parks,” as though they were the property of the Crown; but then in the next sentence he would use the quite different, and indeed inconsistent, language—that the parks had been made over to the people for their recreation and amusement, and generally for all proper and useful purposes. Now he (Mr. Taylor) must say that he was not surprised that amongst such proper and useful purposes Englishmen should think that occasional meetings for the peaceful and orderly discussion of political questions should not be ignored or excluded. But then it was said the Government are bound to keep the peace, and to take precautions that no meeting at which violence was threatened or probable should be permitted. To that proposition he gave his entire concurrence; but then it had no special reference to a meeting in the Park, or elsewhere. The Government were responsible for the maintenance of order, and it was their duty to take care that it was not violated in the Park or out of it. But then they were bound by a responsibility to the House and to the country to show that they had sufficient grounds for interfering with the usual and constitutional right of meeting. In this case they had no such right, because they could not allege, and did not allege, that they had any fear of a disturbance. What said the Proclamation of the right hon. Gentleman? It said, meetings for political discussion were not permitted. Permitted by whom?—he should like to inquire. The simple fact was that the plea that such meetings interfered with the general enjoyment of the people was a mere pretext, as the people very well knew; the real object being to prevent a mass meeting on Reform. The Government did not believe that the proceedings of the Reform League would cause a disturbance. The only disturbance to be apprehended was through Government interference with the meeting, and hence the responsibility for any breach of the peace would rest with the Government. But it was said that now at any rate the people knew that they would be acting illegally, since the Proclamation had been issued by the Government. Now he wished to point out that proclamations did not, happily, in this constitutional country, constitute law. He had the highest possible respect for the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole); but he ventured to tell him that he did not constitute in himself all the governing elements in the country—he was not exactly Queen, Lords, and Commons rolled into one. He (Mr. Taylor) asked what law it was under which political meetings were forbidden in the Park; and if the right hon. Gentleman could only point to his own manifesto, he (Mr. Taylor) respectfully denied its validity. It was not very long since the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had defended in that House all the infamous atrocities committed in Jamaica on the ground that they were done under a proclamation of martial law. Now he had not yet heard that such doctrines were to be applied at home as well as in our colonies; he even thought it not impossible that, after the luminous charge lately delivered by the Lord Chief Justice, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer might not be anxious to repeat his dictum. But be that as it might, he (Mr. Taylor) was prepared to take the responsibility, whether as a vice-president or in any other capacity, of declaring his conviction that the Reform League was correct in believing that in calling a meeting in Hyde Park they were not acting illegally, and in throwing the full responsibility of any disturbance that might ensue upon the foolish interference of the Government. He thought the Government should not now be pressed as to the exact course they intended to pursue on Monday. They had already stated that they did not propose to prevent the people entering the Park, and that they should not interfere unless a breach of the peace should occur; and he, for one, had no fear that any such misfortune would occur, except through the forcible intervention of the police, of which, after the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, he had no apprehension.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I rise to reply to the inquiries recently put to the Government lest it should be thought that we are deficient in courtesy. I had hoped that what was stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer a short time since would have been sufficient. It has been said most distinctly that as long as persons, whom I will not more particularly define, walk into the Park in a peaceful and well-conducted manner, no attempt shall be made to prevent their entrance. I trust that, after what has been said upon both sides of this House, this ill-advised intention on the part of the Reform League will be abandoned. But if, in spite of what has been said here, and in defiance of the notification that has been issued by the Home Secretary, the intention of the League is still maintained, the Government will act at its discretion. But, inasmuch as we have reason to believe that steps have already been taken with a view to evade any arrangements the Government may have made, we do not think it our duty publicly to state here the course we should take under circumstances which we cannot foresee. We have taken and shall take abundant precautions to protect the public peace, and I hope those precautions will be successful in preventing unpleasant consequences.

has stated that the Government cannot, consistently with their duty, tell us what they can do under circumstances they cannot foresee; and nothing can be more reasonable. But what we want to know is what will they do under circumstances which they can foresee, because they have been announced in the form of a programme of proceedings. We are told that a number of persons intend to go to Hyde Park. That is a perfectly legal proceeding. But they intend when they go there to hold a meeting. I gather from the Secretary of State (Mr. Walpole) that that is not in itself an illegal proceeding. [A Member of the Government was understood to dissent from this.] I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say, in substance, that the Crown gives a licence to its subjects to go to the Park; but that licence is revocable, and that it would be the pleasure of the Crown, as announced in the notice which has been given, if the persons meeting in the Park on Monday evening proceed to hold a public meeting on the subject of Reform, to revoke the licence, and that those forming the meeting would thus be made trespassers. Now, the question I want answered is this. As the Government knows it is the distinct intention of certain persons to hold a public meeting on Reform in the Park, and as they have announced that such persons will become trespassers by so doing, I want to know what course the Government will take with regard to those persons when they act as they say they will? It is useless for the Government to say they do not foresee this event. They do foresee it. The Home Secretary has certainly foreseen it. He has told us exactly what is anticipated, and he has said something about handing them out of the Park. Is that to be done, or is nothing to be done? The members of the Reform League have clearly stated what they mean to do, unless they change their minds. If the Government wishes to prevent a great calamity, it will do its duty and announce what it will do in the event of the Reform League carrying out its programme. I ask the Government to declare its intentions in this respect. It appears to me that the Government, in not answering the questions put to it, incurs a heavy responsibility. If the people are led to suppose that they can hold this intended meeting with impunity, subsequent interference would produce a sense of wrong. The people will think they have not been fairly dealt with. This, I think, is a fearful responsibility for a Government to assume. I make these observations in no hostile spirit. I put these questions simply in the cause of order. I do not ask you what measures you will take to suppress a riot. A riot is like a battle; events must be met as they arise. But while nothing has been done to rouse hot passions, it is of the last importance that you should tell us what you will do when the meeting has begun. Do you mean to dissolve the meeting and turn the people out of the Park? If they resist, do you mean to have recourse to force, and will you treat those who resist as criminals? Unless the Government announce what the people will have to expect if this meeting is held, the Government, in case of disturbance arising, will be charged with having caused a very great calamity.

MR. NEATE said, that in deference to the wishes of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), he desired, with the permission of the House, to withdraw his Motion.

IRELAND—THE FENIAN PRISONERS.

QUESTION.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he objected to the withdrawal in order to give an opportunity to the Home Secretary to reply to the following Question, which he had put on the Notice Paper—namely, Whether the attention of the Secretary of State for the Home Department has been called to certain statements which lately appeared in the public newspapers in reference to alleged harsh and cruel treatment of prisoners undergoing penal servitude for political offences; and, if so, whether he has made any inquiry with respect to them, and taken any steps or given any instructions in consequence?

MR. WALPOLE: My answer to the Question put by the hon. Member will at the same time answer to the wish he himself expressed when putting the Question—namely, that he hoped the statements to which he referred would be found devoid of foundation. As soon as I received notice of the hon. Member's Question, I directed inquiries to be made, and the result has been a Report upon the subject. I will not trouble the House by reading the lengthened statements which I hold in my hand, but merely the short answer to the allegations which have been made. It had been stated that Lynch died of the treatment which he received in gaol. The fact is that he died of consumption of long standing. Luby and Keane were said to have suffered from dysentery caused by gruel which was given to them. The fact is not so. To the assertion that the prisoners were all stripped naked and kept one hour waiting for the doctor at Portland, the answer is, "This is false." These papers enter into the circumstances of a variety of cases. One man was said to have broken two of his fingers. That is untrue. [MR. MAGUIRE: What about Roantree?] Roantree was said to have been suffering from a painful disease, and to have been kept at work till he was pronounced incurable. This is not true. O'Donovan Rossa is said to have undergone constant punishment. This was his own fault, for he seems to have been constantly rebelling against the laws of the prison. The allegations that the cells are damp and that the convicts were forced to work in the rain and were kept in their wet shirts are reported to be untrue. I wish to remark that I am giving merely a summary of the answers which are contained in the Reports. I am perfectly willing to put the Reports themselves into the hands of the hon. Member, and before I came down to the House I said that if there was any case in which, having read the papers, he was not satisfied, it was my wish that the hon. Gentleman should, by communication with Colonel Henderson, have the fullest opportunity of prosecuting further inquiries. As to the general question about prisoners undergoing penal servitude as Fenians being treated differently from those placed in penal servitude for other crimes, that is a very grave question to be discussed and decided, independently of present considerations. I do not offer any opinion upon that question at the present moment. It is a fair subject for discussion. But this is evident that there would be great difficulty in drawing a distinction between different classes of offenders condemned to similar punishments, and treating them in different modes. The hon. Member said the Fenian prisoners were classed with common felons and murderers. That is not correct; the Fenian prisoners, instead of being classed with such offenders, were kept apart.

MR. MAGUIRE: You have not said anything about Kickham and the "monster of iniquity."

MR. WALPOLE: The statement was that Kickham was associated at Woking with a monster in human form. The answer is that it was not so.

MR. BAGWELL said, that the subject, because it was an Irish one, was treated with an amount of levity which would not be tolerated if the complaint proceeded from an English Member of irregularities in English prisons. The statement made by the Home Secretary was anything but satisfactory. In reply to allegations such as had been put forward, the fullest details instead of short answers ought to have been given. The statement as to the water-closets and several others were not denied. As regarded Lynch, said to have died of consumption of long standing, nothing was so likely to accelerate the fatal effects of consumption as depriving the invalid of his flannels. The answer of the Secretary of State and the reception given to this Motion showed that the House did not care what the opinion of Irish Gentlemen might be on this subject. A solemn silence would be preserved if complaints of cruelties in prisons were preferred with regard either to England or to Naples.

LORD NAAS: I think the remarks made by the hon. Member who has just sat down upon the reply of my right hon. Friend are very unjust. My right hon. Friend said he was quite prepared to place all these documents at the disposal of the hon. Member (Mr. Maguire), that the hon. Member might have an opportunity of verifying by these Reports the correctness and incorrectness of the statements made by him; and that it would be for the hon. Member, after perusal of those documents, in case he considered that course desirable, to say whether or not there was anything that he still thought it necessary to bring under the notice of the House. These documents are statements of great length, involving the most minute details, and it would be perfectly impossible for my right hon. Friend, within the ordinary limits of a speech, to go into all the questions to which they refer. If the hon. Member, having read these papers over, thinks that the prison officers have behaved in a cruel and unnecessarily harsh manner, it will be for him to bring those points in their conduct under the notice of my right hon. Friend, and if he fails to receive from my right hon. Friend that satisfactory answer which he thinks his inquiries deserve, he still has this House to appeal to. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that the last thing any Member of the present Government would sanction would be any unnecessarily harsh treatment of prisoners. The larger question, whether political prisoners ought to be treated in a different way from ordinary criminals, is one that cannot be decided now. There are arguments in favour of such a course, and there are, I think, stronger arguments against it. It would certainly have the effect of throwing upon the Executive Government the invidious duty of determining under what class of treatment particular criminals were to fall. Still, as I have said, the subject is a legitimate one for discussion. I believe that if the hon. Member for Cork will now make inquiries—and after what has passed to-night he is bound to make inquiries—and if he will examine carefully into these reports he will find, I think, that a great number of the statements which he has put forward have been grossly exaggerated. For those which he may find to be substantiated he will have no difficulty in obtaining a remedy.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he would appeal to the indulgence of the House to grant him a hearing. He had not made the statement on his own authority. He had given his authority, and had inquired from the Government as to the accuracy or non-accuracy of the facts put forward. The challenge thrown out by the noble Lord he was willing to accept, but only in this sense:—If the Government gave him authority to examine the prisoners themselves. ["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: It does not appear to me that this is a matter of such immediate urgency that the hon. Member should ask to put on one side the ordinary rules of the House. At the same time, and with the permission of the House, there would probably be no objection to his offering any remarks that may be necessary to clear up any point of moment; but for him to enter into a general statement would be irregular.

MR. MAGUIRE said, that if he got permission to make a fair and not an ex parte investigation, he was willing to do so. If allowed to examine both sides in the prisons, he would devote a week to the purpose; otherwise he must decline.

MR. BRADY said, he thought the proposal just made a very reasonable one. The truth could not, he believed, be elicited if the reference were merely to be to the gaol authorities, because they would not be expected to criminate themselves. He should be glad, in conjunction with his hon. Friends the Members for Cork and Tralee, to form a trio to examine into the subject if the noble Lord would give them the necessary authority. With respect to the man who was alleged to have died of consumption, if he had consumption no better way could be devised of accelerating his death than to take his flannels from him. The physician should have interfered to prevent that proceeding. There could be no doubt but that taking away the man's flannels had hastened his death.

INFECTIOUS DISEASES.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

SIR J. CLARKE JERVOISE said, he rose to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to cause such inquiry to be instituted as may lead to the better distinction between Contagious Diseases and such as are termed Infectious, so as to obviate, as far as possible, the loss, alarm, and injustice consequent on the theory of the infectious nature of certain Diseases when unsupported by demonstration."

He had risen at a late hour of the night for a discussion of the subject and under circumstances of great discouragement. There was a certain amount of surplusage in his Motion, because no restriction could be enforced which did not involve loss, alarm, and injustice, unless it was founded "on demonstration." Therefore those words had better be left out. They had heard a good deal of strong language in the course of the evening; but he might say, without exaggeration, that this was a question of the utmost importance. The theory of the conveyance of disorders by some mysterious agency from one person to another in our state of society must, he thought, be regarded as one of the most important matters which could engage their attention. It affected people in every position in life, every association, and meeting of persons in any capacity, whether at home or abroad. It might be viewed in its bearing not only on persons who were at liberty, but on a class of persons whose case had been under discussion that evening—namely, those who were placed in confinement. Nothing could be more shocking than that persons should be locked up in gaols under the idea that they might be subject to the influence of infectious disorders. It was also of great importance to our young and rising colonies, where the example set by the mother country would have great influence. In illustration of the evils endured by this class of persons, he might refer to a tale written by a French author, called the Leper of Aosta, which, he doubted not, was familiar to all that heard him. A poor leper and his sister were shut up in a tower and condemned to a miserable life of seclusion on account of their fearful malady. Their only companion was a little cur dog, and the sister having died the brother was left alone with the pet dog, which, however, the authorities ordered to be destroyed, in order to prevent the infection from being carried elsewhere; and the wretched man at last committed suicide to relieve himself from an insupportable existence. That tale was founded so much upon fact that it might be said to be almost a true representation of the state of things at the present time. The infectious nature of leprosy was believed in in many parts of India, where great cruelties were inflicted in connection with the precautions adopted in regard to those who suffered from that malady. He avowed himself a disbeliever in infection, and in specifics prescribed and recommended to protect persons supposed to be especially exposed to it. Precautions that were recommended were too complicated or costly for general adoption by those upon whom they were urged. What was the use of urging that no water should be drunk that had not been boiled if people were destitute of the means of boiling it. There were outbreaks of cholera at Southampton, and of scarlet fever at Aldershot Camp, and elsewhere, but medical men, trained nurses, and others in immediate contact with patients escaped the communication of the disease. If medical men carried infection to their own children, the patients of medical men were exposed to danger quite as much as the members of their own families. He had with him a paper containing the Report of two gentlemen who had been sent over to Russia by this country, at an expense of £396, to inquire into the infectious nature of a certain disorder. Though they reported that the disorder in question was not infectious, the Report went on to say that it would be desirable if persons coming from abroad with dangerous communicable diseases would so dispose themselves in lodging and seclusion as not to endanger the health of the community. This would be very well if persons knew what those dangerous communicable diseases were. What he desired was that a small commission should be formed, consisting of two persons—one the most eminent chemist that Europe could afford for love or money, and an eminent lawyer to sift the evidence. He had put a number of questions on this subject to various Governments.

Amendment proposed.

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to cause such inquiry to be instituted as may lead to the better distinction between Contagious Diseases and such as are termed Infectious, so as to obviate, as far as possible, the loss, alarm, and injustice consequent on the theory of the infectious nature of certain Diseases when unsupported by demonstration,"—(Sir Jervoise Clarke Jervoise,)

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU regretted that the question of the hon. Baronet (Sir J. Clarke Jervoise) had been so ambiguous, that he had not been able to divine to what it pointed. If he had known this he would have taken care to have informed himself more fully upon it. He confessed his ignorance of the circumstances of the outbreak of leprosy at Aosta, the infection of which (according to the hon. Baronet) had been carried by a little dog. A Commissioner had been sent to Russia to inquire into "the black disease," and this gentleman reported that the disease was not infectious, so that it did come under the Motion of the hon. Member. It was true that in the other House Earl Granville had said that it was so, and that a great many persons had died from it; but this was a mistake. Earl Granville seems to have had in his mind another disease which also existed in Russia, and which was highly infectious. This disease broke out among cattle, but was communicated to human beings; and according to the last Report to the Russian Government, upwards of 90,000 cattle were killed by it during the year and 3,000 men. As to the cattle plague, this was not the time for a cattle plague debate, the proper occasion for which would arise in a very short time when a Bill would be introduced on the subject. He was sorry to say, however, that there had been recently a fresh outbreak of cattle plague in London. The existence of the disease here had been suspected for some time, owing to the secret removal of cattle in large numbers from some dairies. At last it was ascertained that the disease existed in one dairy at Limehouse where there were thirty-nine cows, which all had the disease and all of which were killed. This happened in the preceding week, and he trusted that the slaughter of these cattle had prevented the further spread of the disease. With regard to contagious and infectious diseases; the two terms were treated pretty much as convertible; but infection was the larger term, denoting, in fact, the genus, while contagion indicated the species. In medical writings infection denoted the communication of disease. Infectious diseases were firstly those which were communicated from man to man; and secondly, those which were communicated by some fermentible or zymotic poison generated in the air, or at least external to man; such as malaria. The former species was denoted by the term "contagious diseases." And these are of two kinds, either immediate or communicated by the touch; or mediate, that is communicable by the breath or presence of a person, such as whooping cough and measles. Yellow fever was not contagious, though it was infectious. What possible harm, therefore, was there in Dr. Seaton's visit to the ship at the Motherbank? The disease was communicable by the air and not by contact with persons. Perhaps the hon. Member would say, "Why, then, impose any quarantine?" The answer was that it was not a medical but a commercial quarantine; it was imposed not through fear of the spread of yellow fever among persons in England, but in order that our ships and merchandise should not be subjected on arrival to quarantine abroad, and occasioned the loss which delay would entail. The modes and conditions of the propagation of preventible diseases were pretty well known by this time. There might be some few special diseases upon which additional knowledge was required. But surely the Health Office, in which there were two or three medical men of great scientific attainments and experience, afforded a better means of investigation than that proposed by the hon. Member—a Commission composed of a chemist and a lawyer. He did not know what would be the business of the lawyer, except, he supposed, to impose the interminable restrictions of the law upon the spread of disease. But the hon. Gentleman would see that with men who had spent all their lives in the investigation of the subject, and with all the appliances which were necessary at their command, the Privy Council were much more likely to arrive at sound conclusions and make valuable discoveries than the Commission which the hon. Baronet recommended. The hon. Baronet had alluded to the cholera. He was happy to say that upon this important subject most careful and accurate investigations had been carried on during the last year, the results had been tabulated, and in a few days a voluminous Report would appear, which, he trusted, would be satisfactory to the hon. Baronet. There were other points to which the hon. Baronet had called attention; but as he had considerable difficulty in hearing the hon. Gentleman's remarks, he trusted that would be sufficient excuse if he desisted from pursuing the subject further.

NATIONAL EDUCATION.—QUESTION.

MR. HUBBARD said, he rose to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government that the Grants voted to promote Elementary Education be administered in strict conformity with the principles and regulations of the Revised Code, as approved by Parliament; with reference to Section 22 of the Revised Code, whether the number of scholars now considered adequate to maintain a school is greater or less than the number, thirty, for whom School Plans have been provided by the Committee of Council on Education; whether families interested in a proposed school will be allowed to decide for themselves the suitability of the religious denomination under which it is founded; and whether, in the event of a denominational school not being acceptable to all the families locally interested, its suitability will be determined by reference to the majority who can, or to the minority who cannot maintain it? He said, that in 1803 the number of scholars was not much more than 500,000, or about 57 in the 1,000 of the whole population. At present the number was supposed to be 2,500,000, or about 130 in the 1,000. The progress that had been made was therefore highly gratifying. The National Society, which had been in existence for half a century, had done a great deal; the number of children in its schools at present amounting to about 1,160,000. The British and Foreign School Society had also taken a very active and successful part. The Wesleyan Methodists and the Roman Catholics had also exerted themselves with great effect in promoting education. Much, likewise, had been done by the Education Department of the Privy Council which, constituted thirty years since, had been intrusted by the State with the distribution of funds for the object. The Education Department, indeed, had not only distributed the funds, but had applied themselves to the improvement of education. The result of their labours was that at the present moment the Government Inspectors examined about 12,000 schools containing about 1,262,000 scholars. After all that had been done, however, there was said to be about 500,000 children still in want of education. If we looked at the state of our prisons and reformatories, and judged by the evidence of our criminal statistics, we must admit that even though the deficiency be not so great as it had been represented, much still remained to be done. If education had not been carried as far as it ought, then we must look with regret upon any proceedings which might have the effect of staying its course. It would be found from the Returns issued by the Education Department that, having acted with great success up to 1859, the extreme point of the contributions made by the Committee of Council to the building of schools was then reached. Having given as much as £154,000 in building grants, they had year by year diminished those grants, until in 1865 they reached the comparatively low sum of £19,000, though the demand for education had not relaxed. We were bound to look for the cause of this remarkable falling off that we might see whether it could not be remedied. In order to judge fairly of the matter it was necessary to consider what had been done in both Houses of Parliament upon the subject. When the Educational Board was first constituted many very eminent friends of education were anxious to take the whole work out of the hands of denominational agents, and to make the system entirely secular. But the opinion of the House and the country was against such a proceeding, and the result was that year by year grants were made by Parliament for the purposes of education on what was designated the denominational system. This system was based upon the fundamental principle that education must comprise as one of its essential elements a certain amount of religious instruction. While, however, the State undertook to distribute amongst the various educational agencies the amount of money annually voted by Parliament, it left to the religious managers of schools the whole control of those schools and the responsibility of including in the education they gave that element of religious instruction stipulated for by the Legislature. If they looked through the papers presented to Parliament from time to time upon the subject of education, they would find an explanation of the falling off in the Government grants. In 1859 an attempt was made to economize the national expenditure. This was, of course, desirable; but he must express his regret that the subject of education had been selected for the purpose of exercising that economy. For, while we had been saving hundreds from school grants, we had, perhaps, been expending thousands in the repression of crime, and in the establishment of reformatories. The following was the mode in which the school grants were economized. Parishes comprising populations of something less than a thousand applied for a grant, usually through the clergy, and they were required to make a religious census of their people, or, in other words, to do what in that House had, on another occasion, been stigmatized as "ticketing." The taking of a religious census in any shape had been refused by Parliament. Therefore, when the Education Department imposed on the promoters of schools such an office, they took a course unwarranted by any authority from that House. But it was not merely the demand for a religious census, but the method of carrying out that demand which was reprehensible. In some cases it amounted to this—that where the school promoters were not able to distinguish between Churchmen and Dissenters they were told to draw the line of church attendance and to class all who did not go to Church as Dissenters. Therefore, the dissolute, the intemperate, and the idle, the very persons who most wanted education, were to be set down as Dissenters, and thus children were to be denied the education they required. If different denominations simultaneously applied for school grants the Department required them to reconcile their differences, and to unite in establishing one school before they would make a building grant; but everyone acquainted with the religious differences which existed in this country must be aware that they were not matters of caprice, but were generally the growth of habit or the result of honest conviction, and as such ought to be respected by Parliament and by the Committee of Council. Managers of the larger proportion of Church schools in the rural parishes were necessarily the clergy, whose liberality in the cause of education, far exceeding as it did that of the laity, was worthy of all praise. The education of the rural population rested mainly with them, and it was upon them that the Conscience Clause was sought to be enforced. The real effect of that clause was to give to any parent disapproving the doctrines of the Church a legal right to withdraw his child from all religious instruction and insist on his receiving a purely secular education. He believed that the practice of coupling grants with such a stipulation was contrary to the intention and feeling of the House. It was irreconcilable with the present denominational system. If it were enforced the consequence would be that the clergy would be disabled from extending as they desired the education of the labouring class. He could find nothing in the Revised Code to warrant any of these obstructions, and he wished to know whether the operations of the Department were to be guided by that Code or by some by-law which existed behind the scenes, and which was not subject to the control of Parliament. He desired such an extension of that Code as would adopt the principle of payment for results without insisting on the employment of certificated teachers. In touching on that point he could not help regretting that a gentleman conspicuous for his talents and for his zeal in the cause of education—he referred to Mr. Walter—was not now a Member of the House, since he would have taken a lively interest in a discussion on this subject. He had carefully considered the objections which were offered to the proposal of paying for results, and they had failed to convince him that it was not the natural expansion of the present system. He admitted that the object of the Department was not merely to extend, but improve education. Surely, however, payment for results was one of the most certain means of determining which system was the more successful. Was it fair or just to say to those whom they were reproaching for not educating the people, "Come and take one of our teachers, who will cost twice as much as the teachers you now employ?" The capitation grant should be given to any school in the country that deserved it, without reference to the teacher by whom the results had been obtained. If there was a great advantage to the country in having certificated teachers, let there be a contribution from the State quoad the employment of such teachers. The principle of our denominational system was that it was a religious system. He was convinced that in this country no other system could prevail. While as a free people we objected to despotic methods of education, we were anxious that children should early receive religious instruction, and should not be left to pick it up, or not, at a more advanced age. To supersede the denominational system for a system of rating would be a most disastrous step. It would entirely eliminate the religious element. It would deprive the country of the services of thousands of able and devoted men who now gave their valuable assistance, and it would involve the country in much greater expense. On all these accounts he deprecated any deviation from the present basis. He desired its extension and enlargement, being satisfied that had the Department acted more in accordance with the feeling of the English people so much educational destitution would not have now existed. He was anxious that the denominational system should be more faithfully adhered to by the Department. No misplaced economy should insist on the formation of a large school for a whole parish, when the feeling of the people was in favour of small denominational schools. It was much better frankly to acknowledge our religious differences, and to let all parties work as best they could in their own way than to try and force them to co-operate. The promoters of Church schools were resolute in their resistance to the obnoxious clause. No persuasions, threats, or fines would ever induce them to accept it. Even if the annual grants were made contingent upon its adoption the only result would be that the education of the people would be taken out of their hands, and that the State would have to undertake the

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, that after the very able and moderate speech of his hon. Friend, he thought he should have no difficulty in giving a satisfactory answer to his Questions. The first Question was—

"Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government that the Grants voted to promote Elementary Education be administered in strict conformity with the principles and regulations of the Revised Code, as approved by Parliament?"

He unhesitatingly answered in the affirmative. There was, moreover, no code of rules in the back-ground; no regulations of which Parliament was not cognizant and had not sanctioned. With regard to his hon. Friend's second Question, it arose from a misapprehension, as the School Building Grant had never once been refused on account of the sparseness of the labouring population. A school had been built for as few as twenty; another for only thirty children. The misapprehension arose from the fact that, in an early volume of the Minutes, the smallest plan of a school happened to be one for thirty scholars; and in a late volume the smallest plan was for forty-eight. But there is not, and never has been, a minimum limit to the size of a school. The hon. Gentleman had alluded to Section 22. The object of that section was to enable the Committee of Council to refuse another school where schools already existed, which were sufficient for the population. The House might suppose a case where a landowner possessing a large park with a cottage for his game-keeper, and another for his coachman, and another for his gardener, might apply for a grant for the children of those persons. Such an application would be refused under Section 22 of the Revised Code. The hon. Gentleman conceived that in certain cases of large parishes of above 1,000 inhabitants, some of whom were Churchmen and some Dissenters, the Committee of Council were in the habit of telling them that they must sink their differences, in order that the Government might have to build only one school. That was a misapprehension; such a course was never taken. Nor did the Government compel a clergyman to "ticket his parishioners" or make a return of all his parishioners as either Churchmen or Dissenters. What they said was, "Tell us the proportion of Dissenters and Churchmen." Sometimes the clergyman returned the number of Dissenters in his parish at one-ninth; while the Dissenters returned themselves as one-fourth. The Committee of Council did not consider these two statements as necessarily contradictory and untrue; because the clergyman regarded all who went to church as Churchmen, while the Dissenters regarded all who went to chapel as Dissenters. Throughout the country many persons went to Church in the morning, and went to hear some favourite preacher at the Dissenting chapel in the evening. Such persons would therefore be counted among each congregation; both ministers would claim them. It was fair to remark, however, that such persons, and very many Dissenters likewise, repaired to the church clergyman for marriage, baptism, and frequently also for burial. Such persons seemed, therefore, to be rather Churchmen than Dissenters. But the view taken by the Committee of Council was that "Nothingarians" or persons who went to no place of worship were always to be counted as Churchmen. The reason was that, as there was a National Church in this country, it was presumed that those who did not claim to belong to other religions and did not frequent other places of worship belonged to the National Church. He now proposed to take the third and fourth questions together, and he thought it would be in his power to remove a little misapprehension which existed in the mind of the hon. Member. If an application came to the Government for a building grant for a school, and if the parish happened to contain more than 900 inhabitants, the Committee of Council would grant it; although there might be another application for an undenominational school for the same place; because they thought that such a parish was large enough for two schools. If, however, the parish contained less than 900 inhabitants, the Committee of Council inquired in that case what proportion of Dissenters there was in the parish. He might be asked why they fixed upon 900 as the limit. He answered that it was in order that they might not needlessly multiply the number of schools. But why should they guard against the unnecessary multiplication of schools? For three reasons. First, because of the injustice which would be involved in such an administration of the public funds. The Government had a limited sum to distribute throughout the country; and their object was to raise up schools as fast as they could, and advance a sound education speedily throughout the country. If, however, they set up two schools needlessly in one parish, they would not be able to build one school in some other parish. With a limited sum at command, they could not be profuse in one locality without defrauding and stinting another. Another reason was that they had to consult the convenience of the parishes themselves. One schoolmaster could only teach 150 children, and as that was the proportion of children of the school ages in a population of 900, the latter was the maximum number fixed upon for the population of a "single-school parish." Now, the principal expense of a school consisted in the payment of the schoolmaster, who received from £100 to £120 a year. If a parish of 900 inhabitants had two schools, there would be a double cost; and as the inhabitants would still give about the same sum in subscriptions for two schools as they would for one, and as the Government grant would be the same whether there were two schools or one school, the expense would be doubled while the income remained the same. The consequence would be that both schools would languish, become inefficient, degraded and moribund. Another reason was for the sake of discipline. A case had just come under his knowledge in North Wales, where there was a Church school and an undenominational school in one parish. If a boy were unruly, and were checked by his master, he felt his dignity offended, complained to his father, and left that school for the other. The state of the schools at last became so bad that the two masters came together, and each entered into a voluntary compact not to take any boys from the school of the other, without a bene decessit in writing. For this reason it was that in the country the Committee of Council endeavoured not to build two schools within three miles, at least, from each other. Therefore, on these three grounds—first, the economical administration of the public funds; secondly, the burden upon the parish itself, and the establishment of two bad schools, instead of one good one; and thirdly, on the ground of discipline—the Government had come to the decision to build only one school in parishes of less than 900 inhabitants, unless there were some special reason to the contrary. To return to the point from which he had digressed: if the parish contained fewer than 900 inhabitants, the Committee of Council wrote back to the promoters to ask how many Dissenters there were in the parish. If the promoters replied that there were fewer than one-sixth, the Committee of Council gave them the school they asked for, whether it were national, church, or undenominational. That rule had been laid down by the right hon. Member for Calne, on the principle de minimis non curat lex; which meant, in this case, that the Government would not take account of less than one-sixth of Dissenters. If there were more than one-sixth of Dissenters, then it became a question whether the ground was clear or not—that is, whether a school did or did not already exist in the parish. If the ground was not clear, and there was a church school or an undenominational school for instance, then the Committee of Council could grant one school of the denomination required by the promoters, whether it were a church school or a national or other kind of school. If, on the contrary, the ground were clear, three cases might arise. In the first case the Dissenters might be in one corner of the parish, and in the contiguous corner of the next parish there might also be Dissenters. The Committee of Council then gave a Church school to the part where there were Church inhabitants only, and one undenominational school for the Dissenting portions of both parishes; because the Dissenters did not care for the division of parishes. Another case that might arise was when the promoters said they did not choose to have a Conscience Clause, but would build a school for themselves without asking for a building grant. Then as soon as the school was built they came to the Committee of Council for annual grants. In the third case only it was that the promoters were required to accept a Conscience Clause. The Committee of Council said it would be unfair to the inhabitants of the parish, a large proportion of which were of a different religion, if the distinctive tenets of the majority were to be thrust upon the minority. A building grant would therefore be refused, unless they consented to receive the Conscience Clause. The Conscience Clause made no difference in regard to Church children. They still remained under the stringent Minute of August 10, 1840. The inspector would still be bound to examine them in the catechism, and to report on the religious character and discipline of the school. It was only in regard to Dissenters that the Conscience Clause took effect. The effect of the Conscience Clause was to withdraw the children of Dissenters from the class, during the period of religious teaching, if the parents especially objected to that teaching; and only if a specific objection was made. He thought the Committee of Council was bound to continue the practice which Parliament had sanctioned, and which had till now remained unchallenged by any direct vote in the House. He had procured a Return which he had that very day laid upon the table, and which would, he believed, be in the hands of Members in less than ten days. It was a Return from January 1, 1861, to March 31, 1867, of the awards of building grants. The awards of building grants for Church schools amounted to 867, the awards for all other schools, Wesleyan, Roman Catholic, Congregational, Baptist, Presbyterian, denominational of all kinds, and undenominational schools, were only eighty-seven; making together 954. The number of applications for building grants for National and Church of England schools in which no Conscience Clause had been asked for by the Committee of Council, was 829. The number in which the Conscience Clause had been accepted was sixty-eight, and the number in which it had been refused was thirty-seven, during all those years. But of those thirty-seven proposed schools, twelve schools had been built without the building grant, and they now received annual grants. The number in which the Conscience Clause had been insisted on, but in which no answer had been returned to the office, was only five; and of these, two were already in the receipt of annual grants. The hon. Member would therefore see that the Committee was not very severe in the administration of the rule of which he had spoken. He might be asked who had devised the Conscience Clause? It had not been devised. The Conscience Clause had been forced upon them by circumstances. Formerly their operations had been carried on in populous places; they had been engaged in building schools in towns and in large parishes which could maintain many schools. Thus they had been constructing schools for the various denominations. It was after these places had been supplied, in 1861, that they began to work in small, poor, one-school parishes. They had then to consider how they could best act with regard to economy of their funds and justice to all persons. They endeavoured to make the public fund go as far as possible, in order to bring education into every parish, and to spread schools over the country. Wherever practicable, they wished rather to have one school than two, merely on economical reasons, so that the sum which would build two schools in one parish, might adequately supply two parishes with one school each. Another principle which had constrained them to take this course was the principle of parental authority. This principle had been acknowledged by the law of the land. The Court of Chancery directed that orphans should be brought up in the religion of the father, even although the father was no longer alive. The hon. Member himself, in a pamphlet he published in 1865, acknowledged the justice of that principle, for he said—

“The parent at his will exercises the right of determining where his children should attend public worship. The rules of the National Society do not forbid the exercise of this right. In the matter of education, all that Churchmen have a right to expect is fairplay and no favour, with equal liberty in the exercise of their means for educating the labouring classes.”

The Committee of Council itself had been instituted on that very principle. The Order of Council appointing the Committee of Council on Education stated that it was

“Her Majesty’s wish that the children and teachers instructed should be duly trained in the principles of the Christian religion, while the rights of conscience should be respected.”

But in all these things much depended, not on the plan, but on the spirit in which the plan was administered. Under the same Code one Vice President of the Council might act so as to make the rules appear most vexatious and unjust; another, under the same rules, might gain the confidence of all parties, and, by fairness and moderation, call out that local effort which was the necessary initiative in the spread of education. The hon. Member had spoken very truly of the clergy. Who were the Committee’s best allies? Why, the clergy. The existence of schools was mainly due to their exertions. In nine cases out of ten who was it that applied for a school? The clergy. It was the clergy who took the initiative; it was the clergy who obtained local subscriptions, without which no step could be taken by the Committee of Council; it was the clergyman who undertook the onerous duty of being manager and correspondent; and when the school was built, it was the clergyman who laboured to make it efficient and to keep the master to his duty. In the Report of the Duke of Newcastle’s Commission, vol. ii., p. 74, Mr. Fraser said that in

Dorset on the average a clergyman subscribed eleven times as much as an average farmer, six times as much as an average householder, and twice as much as the landowners. Was it not plain that the existence of schools over the country was mainly due to the exertions of clergy? And why should they quarrel with their best allies? He was not speaking in a partizan spirit; he did not take a view which was prejudiced, partial, or too favourable to the clergy. The Commissioners, in vol. i., pp. 76, 77, reported deliberately to the same effect—

“169 clergymen contributed £1,782, or £10 10s. each; 399 landowners, £2,127, or £5 6s. each; 217 occupiers, £200, or 18s. 6d. each; 102 householders, £181, or £1 15s. 6d. each; 141 other persons, £228. The rental of the 399 landowners was estimated at £650,000 a year. . . . The heaviness of the burden borne by the clergy was imperfectly indicated even by such figures as these. It frequently happened that the clergyman considered himself responsible for whatever was necessary to make the accounts of the school balance. . . . He was the man who most felt the mischief arising from want of education. . . . He begged from his neighbours, he begged from the landowners; if he failed to persuade them to take their fair share of the burden, he begged from his friends and even from strangers, and at last submitted, most meritoriously and most generously, to bear not only his own proportion of the expense, but also that which ought to be borne by others.”

If the end and object of the Committee of Council really was the spread of education, it was clear that they should take every advantage of the best means. They had not so much to press strangers into their service, as to gain the confidence and encourage the efforts of their friends and allies. What would be thought of a general if, at the commencement of a campaign, he were to bicker with his friends and quarrel with his allies; yet they were waging an internecine struggle, which promised to be a long one, against ignorance, depravity, degradation, darkness, and bad citizenship. He was not arguing for any change in the present system, but he desired rather to support it; and argued against any change that might rashly be made. Whenever they wished to inspire energy and secure really effective work they must lay hold on some popular impulse: and what impulse was so strong as religious feeling; or call it, if you like, sectarian zeal? It was for this reason that religious feeling had been made the fly-wheel of the educational machine. That was the reason why schools were denominational. That was the reason why our whole system had been made essentially denominational. That was why the Revised Code contained the rule that no schools (with one exception) were to be aided unless they were in connection with some religious body. Aye, and this instead of increasing sectarian feeling, really diminished it; for education was the best corrective of polemic fury and antidote to sectarian animosity. Education afforded the proper cure for narrowness and bitterness, as light always expelled darkness. While, on the other hand, if you stop education you nourish bigotry; and if you forbid religious teaching you bottle up a bursting effervescence of acrimony. The opposite system had been vigorously attempted. In 1839 the opposite course had been tried by Lord John Russell; but his undenominational plan came to nothing. Why? because it was undenominational. Every point upon which religions differed was to have been banished from the system. Peace and unity were to have been procured by washing out all differences of hue. He made a silent solitude and called it a happy peace. There was but a poor residuum left—a caput mortuum of religion. Therefore the people of England, who pride themselves on being religious, would not for a moment stand it. They were up in arms and put it down. In 1842, another attempt had been made, but it also came to nought, and melted away like the army of Theudas in the wilderness. All this time education lagged fearfully. A poor paltry £20,000 was all that was voted for education when there were no schools in the country. Then we were the lowest of all nations in education; our standard of education was the worst. Now, on the contrary, we were the highest. In 1833, 1 in every 11½ of the population were scholars on the books of day schools; in 1851, it was 1 in 8½; in 1858, it was 1 in 7·7. In France it was 1 in 9 of the population; in Holland it was about the same; while Prussia was in 1853 very slightly in advance of us. In 1848 the futile attempt to establish undenominational education was given up, after a long controversy about the management clauses; and Lord Lansdowne then allied the system with the religious bodies throughout the country. Instantly education began to spread; and now so much had it improved, that we could vie with any nation of Europe in our standard of education. Mr. Lingen was asked as

“The general offer (that is, offer of aid) does not apply to secular schools?”

He answered—

“No. The Bible must be taught. The school must either belong to one of those denominations which the Committee of Council has expressly recognised, or it must put itself under the Minute of the 3rd of December, 1839, which provides that religious instruction shall be given out of the Bible. A secular school professing that it did not give religious instruction would not be admitted to aid; that point has been ruled several times over.”

The hon. Gentleman had alluded to the decrease in the amount of the building grants from £134,000, in the year 1859, to £24,000 in the present year; but the causes of that decrease were, first, that, after having made grants for so many years the demand for school buildings was of course not so great as it was formerly; the great bulk of the towns had been supplied, and the Committee of Council had gone far to fill the country; there was therefore not so great a demand; secondly, the amount of the grant had been reduced three-eighths, by the Minute of January 21, 1860—namely, from 4s. to 2s. 6d. per square foot, while the building grants for normal schools had been altogether stopped; and thirdly, the operation of the Revised Code had created a fear in the minds of the managers lest they should not be able to maintain their schools if they built them. That fear, however, had now a little passed away, and there had consequently been a considerable increase in the amount of the building grants during the present year. One difficulty to be contended with was that there were no less than 8,000 parishes, with populations under 500, which were as yet unsupplied; and the Committee of Council were obliged to wait until application was made to them before they could give grants for building schools in those localities. The Government, it must be remembered, had abandoned the initiative in education; their principle was to aid local and voluntary effort. The Committee of Council had done nothing to prevent the spread of schools in those places; but the larger and more populous places were naturally the first to call for schools. The Committee of Council anxiously waited for the clergy or others to move in the matter. He trusted that they would speedily do so. The hon. Gentleman was anxious that the necessity for certificated teachers should be got rid of, and that all payments should be made merely by results. But if that were done, they would be destroying their security for good education. Some learning can be measured as a result ; but moral tone, discipline, religious feeling could not be measured and paid for. What was a certificated teacher ? One who had conducted himself well for two years in his training under our eye, and who had every year been visited by the Inspector. Hence the moral and religious character of a certificated teacher was thoroughly well known whereas that of the uncertificated teacher had still to be ascertained. He had endeavoured to answer the Questions of the hon. Gentleman to the best of his ability, and he trusted that he had done so satisfactorily. There was one rule that the Committee of Council endeavoured to follow, and that was to discharge the duty which Parliament had imposed upon them of promoting to the very utmost the education of the country, of raising schools, and of seeing that they were efficiently maintained.

MR. BRUCE said, that while he could not admit the historical accuracy of the noble Lord's statement as to the negotiations between Church and State, he must express his satisfaction at the able speech he had just made. The noble Lord had appealed to him to say whether the standard of education in this country was not as high or higher than that of any other country in the world. In answer to that appeal, he must say that in the best schools assisted by Government the standard of education was equal, if not superior, to those of any other country. But he did not regard the average of our schools as equal to that of Prussia and some other countries. Without some such qualification of the denominational system as is given by the Conscience Clause, it would have been found unworkable, and the interference of Parliament would long since have been sought. It was only by the aid of such a clause that the system of Church schools in small parishes, erected partly out of public funds, could be defended. His complaint was that the position of those who administered the Parliamentary grant was not defined with sufficient accuracy. Too much was left to their arbitrary judgment as to whether they would impose or remit the Conscience Clause. The Committee of Council had, in the course they had taken with regard to this clause, acted, in his opinion, upon a just interpretation of the language of the Revised Code. He was sure that had anything like an exhaustive discussion taken place upon this subject, the principle of the Conscience Clause would have been applied to schools much more widely than at present. The noble Lord had insisted upon the liberality the Church had shown in a pecuniary sense. He (Mr. Bruce) was equally ready to admit that in a majority of instances there had been a corresponding liberality in a religious sense, with, however, some not infrequent exceptions. Some very curious facts had incidentally come to light before the Committee which had sat during the last two Sessions, under the presidency of the Secretary for War (Sir John Pakington). Mr. Collins, a diocesan inspector for Northamptonshire, who had fifteen schools under his inspection, and who was called to give evidence on the value of the teachers' certificate, was incidentally examined as to the Conscience Clause. He stated that the population of his parish was about 500, of whom 100 were Dissenters, Wesleyans, and Baptists. With the full concurrence of his rector, he had excluded absolutely from the school all the unbaptized children, who, so far as he knew, went to no day-school at all. He believed the rule in the village schools in his neighbourhood, in respect of the admission of Dissenters, was very much the same as in his own. Another gentleman, who attended from Mr. Walter's neighbourhood, stated that in his parish, with a population of 600, only forty-five attended the school. This was in consequence of a second school in connection with the British and Foreign Bible Society being erected on account of his refusal to allow the children of Dissenters to attend their own Sunday-school. He held in his hand the monthly paper of the National Society for March, 1867, which contained a letter signed "J. B. S.," on the failure of the present Sunday-school system, its cause, and its remedy. In adverting to the failure of the catechism as an instrument of religious instruction, the writer (the Rev. Mr. Sweet) said—

"You may now question nine scholars out of ten throughout the country as to their own new birth, their own adoption and sanctification, their own relation to Christ, their own Church membership, their own part in the communion of saints, and their own personal interest in other branches of the Church, and in each other, as members of one body, or their own share in the common obligation of the whole Church to evangelize the world, without discovering that the very moderate supply of dogma contained in our catechism is more than a dead letter as regards any practical influence on their affections, hopes, and habits."

To supply this failure of the catechism to impart the requisite dogmatic instruction, the writer proposed to teach to children, of whom three-fourths leave school under ten years of age, as follows:—

"The nature, privileges, offices, and proper unity of the visible Church, or Body of our Lord Jesus Christ, must be carefully instilled; the proper conditions and objects of her connection with the State, in any given country, must be explained and justified; the accident of such connection carefully distinguished from her essential attributes; the commission, character, and power of her threefold ministry, and the nature of her sacraments, conditions of membership, and various rites and holy seasons, taught and enforced; her use of fixed forms of devotion, her creeds and synodal powers vindicated; and the nature and guilt of heresy and schism plainly laid down, and all must be illustrated from Holy Scripture."

That, however, was not enough. The child must not only be taught dogmatic truth, he must be guarded against the danger of imbibing dogmatic error.

"Very closely connected with the suggestion of a more defensive teaching in Church schools is another of a kind the more perplexing to the conductors of town schools in proportion to its importance. It is that no day scholar should ever be allowed to attend a Dissenting Sunday school. You may allow him with comparative impunity to attend a 'Protestant Dissenters' meeting' provided he accompanies his parents; though even this must subject the doctrinal influence of the week-day labours to a violent wrench and a most crucial trial, too probably resulting in a sceptical habit of mind. But to allow him to be subjected to the libellous, not to say blasphemous, misrepresentations of the Church's doctrine which most of the sects practise savours of treason to the child's soul and to the Faith."

These being the dangers to be guarded against, the following rules were proposed for general adoption. First of all to—

He said—

"If any scholar be allowed to be absent from your Sunday school, and also from Divine service at Church, let two conditions at least be insisted on—namely, that his parents take him to their place of worship twice on the Lord's day, and that he attend no Sunday school whatever beyond his home."

He then went on—

"Let the baptism of every scholar be clearly ascertained, proper prayers taught for his daily use, and all unreality in teaching avoided. Then teach dogmatically, illustrating rather than proving to the child by Scripture; basing all personal appeal, in the first instance, on the doctrine of grace received, and obligation incurred in baptism—like St. Paul in Romans vi. and 1st Corinthians vi.—and always pointing the scholar onwards to the laying on of hands and Holy Communion."

In order to secure to the clergy the proper amount of authority his suggestion was—

"Let the parish priest be clearly supreme in the government, as having the prime control of Christ's lambs next after the parents, and as exercising, by their accord, parental authority in the school. With grateful acceptance of lay assistance in every department of the work, and glad use of lay counsel in all things, let there be no 'committee' paralyzing government, and no divided authority perplexing the scholars, but a real though limited monarchy both in week-day and Sunday schools."

His summing up of the whole was as follows:—

"Let no scholar fourteen years of age leave your school in ignorance of the nature and attributes of the visible Church, the duty and blessedness of unity in the Body, in the Faith, and in the Spirit (Eph. iv.), nor of the evils and guilt of heresy and schism; and let the prominent errors of Romanists, Protestant Dissenters, and of Latitudinarians be explained to the more advanced scholars by the clergy themselves, or under their guidance."

It might be said that these were only the words of a correspondent to the paper of the National Society; but the prominence given to a communication, which occupied ten out of the twenty pages of that periodical, showed that these views were not considered extravagant and unpractical by the literary organ of the great Church Education Society. Care ought therefore to be taken that the religious convictions of the parents should be properly respected, and that wherever the public money was granted, they should have the power of withdrawing the child from the religious teaching of the clergyman. He most cordially agreed, therefore, with the Report which had been presented by his right hon. Friend (Sir John Pakington), who had proposed that in all cases where grants were made from the public money the Conscience Clause should be thoroughly enforced. His own opinion was that no grant of public money ought to be made except upon that principle. He could not but express his disappointment that a principle of so much natural justice, and one about which, he might add, he had always met with but one opinion out of doors, should be opposed by a body so respectable, and possessing so many claims upon their gratitude and veneration, as the clergy of the Church of England.

THE CATTLE PLAGUE.—RESOLUTION.

MR. FORDYCE: I rise to move the Resolution of which I have given notice—

“That this House is of opinion that the County of Aberdeen should receive the proportional amount of the Grant which the owners of cattle slaughtered under the compulsory Orders in Council would have received, in accordance with the Privy Council Regulations, had no Cattle Assurance Association been formed within the same.”

It will be in the recollection of the House that during the prevalence of the rinderpest in this country, very arbitrary powers were given to the Privy Council. In August 1865, the Privy Council issued an Order making it compulsory upon the owners of cattle to slaughter their animals without compensation. During the course of the present Session, a grant of £55,000 was made to defray the expense of the cattle which had been slaughtered. Upon Aberdeenshire sending in its claims to a share of this money, to the extent of £824, the claim was disallowed. It was not denied that the cattle had been slaughtered in accordance with the instructions of the Privy Council and the Order of the Government Inspector; but the Privy Council said because there was a Rinderpest Association in the county by which the farmers had been paid, therefore they could not make any further payment. I venture to say—and in this I shall have the support of all the Scotch county Members—that if it had not been for the existence of the Aberdeenshire Rinderpest Association, £1,000,000 would not have covered the amount of loss which would have been sustained. They have therefore felt it to be their duty to apply for this grant. They used their best exertions to enable the Government to carry out their powers, and they have therefore a right to share in the compensation which other counties have received. It is a fallacy to say that the farmers have been re-paid by this Assurance Society. For every £100 which they received for slaughtered cattle they had paid so many pounds beforehand. Therefore, it cannot be said that they have been re-paid. It may be said that if Aberdeenshire is to receive this compensation, other counties in similar circumstances must also receive compensation. I do not see why they should not all receive compensation. From the Return which has been laid upon the table of the House it appears that the total number of cattle slaughtered during the existence of the Order of the Privy Council was upwards of 75,000, and if we take the value of these at £10 per head, and pursue the mode of distribution adopted by the Privy Council—namely, given one-half of the value, we get at a sum of £35,000, which is within the sum granted this year for compensation. [LORD ROBERT MONTAGU: The sum was £25,000.] At all events, the Government would not require any very large additional sum to meet all the claims, and it would be preferable to vote this additional sum rather than perpetrate an injustice.

COLONEL SYKES, in seconding the Motion, said, the question was whether a distinction was to be made between different portions of the kingdom. The course pursued was to give compensation to those who followed a system, and to withhold it from those who invented it.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “this House is of opinion that the County of Aberdeen should receive the proportional amount of the Grant which the owners of cattle slaughtered under the compulsory Orders in Council would have received, in accordance with the Privy Council Regulations, had no Cattle Assurance Association been formed within the same,”—(Mr Fordyce,)

—instead thereof.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, that the claim made by the Aberdeen Association for refunding to them the compensation paid by them, rested upon two grounds. One was the general ground that unless the amount of compensation were refunded the Government would be offering a premium to imprudence, by compensating those who were careless and imprudent, and refusing compensation to those who had had foresight, and had provided funds to meet the exigencies of the case. The other was the special ground, that the Association was not a Mutual Assurance Association; but was formed to carry out the Orders of the Privy Council and to stamp out the plague; and that compensation had been offered merely to induce persons to give information when their animals were attacked, and induce them to co-operate with the society. It was urged that the Association was not formed for purposes of insurance, but was established simply for the purpose of inducing the farmers to consent willingly to the slaughtering of the cattle. No doubt the duties of the Government inspectors had been much facilitated while the compulsory slaughtering Order was in force, by the establishment of this Association. And after the compulsory Order had been withdrawn, the Association had bought up diseased cattle and had killed them. But it should be borne in mind that this Association had refused to compensate those who were not members of that body. There were two instances of such a refusal. From this it appeared evident that the Association was really a Mutual Assurance Association. This view was supported by the "Constitution and Rules of the Aberdeenshire Rinderpest Association, August 1865." Rule iv. is in these words—

"The objects of the Association are, 1st, The Extermination within the county of the Cattle Disease, commonly known as the 'Rinderpest,' and 2nd, The Indemnification of Sufferers by this Disease, to the extent and subject to the Rules and Conditions after mentioned, or such Rules and Regulations as may from time to time be issued by the Central Committee."

And Rule xii. runs thus—

"Sufferers by this disease who are not members of this Association, or members who shall infringe any of the preceding rules or regulations, or the rules, regulations, or precautions which may be issued under any Order in Council, having reference to the Rinderpest, or by the Central Committee, shall have no claim on, or right to the funds of the Association, but the Central Committee shall have power to indemnify such parties to such extent, and in such manner as they shall deem advisable for the public good."

He now turned to the general ground. This, as the hon. Member had acknowledged, would apply equally to all counties, and not to that of Aberdeen alone. In fact, it involved a question of the propriety of the Order of Council of December 1866. The £25,000 which had been granted by the House, had been estimated on the assumption that, under that Order, no associations would be refunded. If that Order was to be annulled the House must be asked to vote £10,000 more. In dealing with other cases on the same principle as it was now proposed to deal with the case of Aberdeenshire great difficulties would present themselves. In Norfolk and Warwickshire the farmers had been compensated from the local rates, and in some counties those farmers who had suffered losses were merely excused from the payment of the regular rates; in others the landlords had compensated the farmers; and would it, then, be proposed now to refund the money to the local rates and to the landlords? The principle now advocated by the hon. Member would lead to a whole host of new and unheard of claims upon which there could be no check, and the difficulties which would result from acting on it were sufficient to induce the House to pause before agreeing to the Motion of the hon. Member.

MR. FORDYCE said, that he only desired that compensation should be given on the same scale as that which had been laid down in other cases.

MR. R. W. DUFF said, he had been unable to discover any valid argument in the speech of the noble Lord why Aberdeenshire should be excluded from the benefits of the compensation fund because it had established an Association of its own. It was notorious that, among the crowd of schemes for the suppression of the cattle plague which occupied the attention of the House in the early part of last Session, the system adopted in Aberdeenshire was considered to be the most effectual, and it was ultimately adopted. It had worked excellently well in the county itself, and had preserved the northern districts of Scotland from the plague. The only reward that they had received at the hands of the Government was a refusal to allow them to participate in the benefit of the money voted for the compensation of sufferers from the disease. This was really placing a premium upon the carelessness, idleness, and indifference of those who had taken no pains to stamp out the plague.

MR. READ said, he should support the Motion. He admitted that his views were not altogether disinterested in doing so, for if the present proposal received the sanction of the House he should take an early opportunity of bringing forward a similar one, substituting "Norfolk" for "Aberdeenshire." The case of the two counties was precisely similar. On the outbreak of the plague an Association was established in Norfolk, £25,000 was subscribed. Rules and regulations for the extirpation of the disease were enforced. Infringements of the Privy Council Orders were prosecuted. Though the Government rendered no aid, and could not stop the fairs, so that the disease was repeatedly re-introduced after being stamped out, the loss of stock was confined to 6,000. But for the Association, 50,000 out of the 100,000 head of cattle in the county would have been lost. The return for all this energy, was that the farmers of Norfolk were refused any compensation for their losses. The funds voted for the purpose were entirely distributed among those improvident or indifferent persons who had stood by with folded hands while the disease was making its greatest ravages throughout the kingdom.

SIR WILLIAM STIRLING-MAXWELL said, he thought that the hon. Member (Mr. Fordyce) had made out a good case. Scotland, and, indeed, the country in general, owed a great deal to the farmers of Aberdeenshire for their pointing out the manner in which the plague might be met. But the noble Lord had clearly shown that the question was surrounded with difficulty. The hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Read) had made a strong claim for his county, and, doubtless, others could make an equally strong claim for theirs. Although he should vote with the hon. Member, he would prefer to leave the matter in the hands of the Government. He had promised to represent the case of Perth to the House. It had happened that the lord-lieutenant of Perth died just as the Cattle Plague Bill was passed. During the three weeks that elapsed before his successor was appointed, although the disease was rife in the district, the local machinery could not be set to work to stop it, or compensate the losers. All that the people of Perth, however, asked, was that the county should have power to assess its inhabitants for the relief of the sufferers at that time. He hoped that the Government would not refuse so reasonable a request.

MR. GRANT DUFF said, he was still of opinion, as he was last year, that it was unadvisable to meet the cattle plague by a public Act and rate. But he was bound to say that it seemed hard that those districts which had exhibited a disposition to help themselves should be permitted to suffer most. He hoped there would be no division, and that the matter would be left in the hands of the Government.

MR. M'LAREN said, he had been applied to to support the cause of Aberdeenshire, and had thought it an isolated case. The Vice President of the Council (Lord Robert Montagu), however, had given unanswerable reasons for refusing the request; and as the public revenue had already suffered far too much from the cattle plague, he should vote against the Motion.

MR. FORDYCE said, he would ask leave to withdraw his Motion. He hoped,

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

DESIGNS FOR THE NEW COURTS OF JUSTICE.—RESOLUTION.

MR. LANYON said, that he desired, as an old member of the Royal Institute of Architects and as President of the Royal Institute of Architects of Ireland, to make a Motion with reference to the advisability of adding professional men to the judges of designs for the new Law Courts. He did not wish to make any imputation upon the judges at present appointed, or offer them any slight in taking this course. The competing architects had the most implicit confidence in the judges as men of honour, but feared they would be wanting in technical knowledge. If the Solicitor General had a great question with reference to the procedure of Chancery, would he bring it before a committee of architects? Or if a question of trade was to be decided on, would the bench of Bishops be the proper tribunal? He was aware that two professional men had been appointed to advise the judges. That was a step in the right direction, but it did not go far enough. Those two professional gentlemen were approved by the competing architects. They had every confidence in them, and it was desired that these two gentlemen should have the same power of voting in the final decision as the fully appointed judges had. It would be only fair towards the judges that they should be assisted in their deliberations by able and competent professional colleagues, as their decision, however righteous and impartial, must unavoidably be criticized by eleven disappointed men. To the public it would likewise be more satisfactory that the judges who were to decide upon this great work, one of the most important ever submitted to competition, should not wholly lack the professional element. He trusted the Government would reconsider the matter, and satisfy the reasonable desire of the competing architects.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that two professional architects should be added to the Committee appointed for the purpose of selecting a Design for the New Courts of Justice,"—(Mr. Lanyon,)

—instead thereof.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, that as the mouthpiece of the Society of British architects he had already communicated to the Treasury the wishes of that body. The claim had been made before, and its justice had been admitted. What was urged against it was that it came too late. He could not see that it was too late to make the alteration suggested. One word of assent from his right hon. Friend (Mr. Cowper) on the part of the judges, would free the hands of the Government, and materially strengthen in public and professional estimation the tribunal of which he was a member.

MR. HUNT said, Her Majesty's Government had no wish in the matter save that of obtaining the best designs of competent architects. The five gentlemen, who, as at present arranged, were to constitute the judges, with the aid of two professional architects as assessors, were selected before the present Government came into office, as the result of conferences which took place in 1865. Though his hon. Friend (Mr. Bentinck) exerted himself last May to procure the addition to the tribunal of some professional members, he let the matter drop without effecting anything practical. [Mr. BENTINCK: I beg pardon. The matter dropped in consequence of the dropping of the Reform Bill.] At all events, from May, 1866, till the present time the matter was never mooted, and the Government naturally supposed that the House acquiesced in the arrangement made by the late Government. If the gentlemen appointed as judges were of opinion that they would derive assistance from the appointment of additional members in the manner now proposed, the Government would offer no opposition to that course. But it was one which they could not sanction without previous communication with the gentlemen who had been already appointed, and had undertaken to act. Under these circumstances, he hoped his hon. Friend would not press the Motion.

MR. COWPER said, that as one of the Committee of five appointed to adjudicate upon these designs, he could entertain no possible objection to the proposal. In any case, very serious and onerous duties must be entailed upon the judges, and as the competitors had declared that the exclusion from the tribunal of professional opinions would not increase their confidence in its decisions, that declaration was entitled to the utmost consideration. The reason why the Committee originally was composed exclusively of unprofessional men was that it was supposed they would be unbiased in their opinions by any of those predilections or prejudices which professional training almost necessarily engendered. He thought that, under the circumstances, no objection to the proposal need be anticipated from other members of the Committee. After what had been said by the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Hunt) there was no necessity for pressing the Motion to a division.

MR. BENTINCK said, he was glad to find that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cowper) had come to his senses on the subject since he had left office. He thought it highly desirable that whenever considerable sums of money were expended in connection with Art, the advice of professional men should be secured.

MR. LANYON said, he would withdraw his Motion. After what had fallen from his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury he was quite prepared to leave the matter in the hands of the Government.

SCOTLAND—REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. MONCREIFF said, he rose to call attention to the absence of information as to the intentions of Government relative to the Representation of the People in Scotland. When an inquiry was recently addressed to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the subject, his reply was that it was desirable further progress should be made with the English Reform Bill before that for Scotland was brought in. He was anxious, if possible, to induce the Government to alter the determination on that point at which they seemed to have arrived. He thought it extremely desirable that before the English Bill made any further progress, the House should be made acquainted with the provisions of the Scotch measure. It was hardly reasonable to ask the representatives for Scotland to vote on the question of the English borough occupation franchise while they were kept in complete ignorance as to how far the principles of that franchise were to be applied to their own country. Setting aside differences of detail, the general principles of a Reform Bill applicable to England must be applicable to Scotland also. On the three former occasions on which a measure of Reform had been read a second time, in 1852, 1860, and last year, the Bill for Scotland was introduced before that for England went into Committee. The Chancellor of the Exchequer could hardly forget that on a former occasion his hon. Friend the present Under Secretary for India (Sir James Fergusson) brought forward a Motion—which was debated for three nights—while the English Bill was in Committee, to the effect that its further progress should be stopped until the Bills for Scotland and Ireland were introduced. That Motion, though not made in form, because it could not be so in accordance with the rules of the House, was strongly supported by the right hon. Gentleman, and he trusted he would in the present instance see the propriety of acting as far as possible in accordance with the views he then advanced. He was the more anxious that the Scotch Bill should be at once laid upon the table because a great deal of light might be reflected on the question of the borough franchise for England by the proposals it would contain. The peculiarity of the proposal with regard to compound-householders did not apply to Scotland, because there there was no Small Tenements Act, no compounding, and nothing corresponding to the rates in this country. The poor rate and other rates were, of course, levied there. But those charges were levied by separate bodies under separate statutes. The poor rate was not levied in every parish, though the number in which it was not was inconsiderable. That being so, it would be impossible to apply the principle bearing upon the case of the compound-householder to Scotland. In other words, the personal payment of rates was in that country the universal rule, and in its case, therefore, household suffrage with payment of rates would be nothing less than household suffrage pure and simple. There was, it was true, a provision that where the value of a tenement was under £4 the proprietor should be liable to pay the rates, and should be entitled to recover the amount afterwards from the tenant. But with that exception there was nothing at all which corresponded with the requirements of the English law on the subject. That being so, he should like to know how the case of Scotland was to be met in any Reform Bill which might be introduced. Was there to be household suffrage, without any restriction, or was the sharp, hard line of a £4 rental to be drawn as defining the qualification in boroughs. It would be singular if a £4 rental should be adopted in Scotland as the basis of the borough franchise after all the tremours and fears that were expressed last year about a £7 rental suffrage. He should express no opinion as to whether the proposal to give Scotland substantially household suffrage, pure and simple, was a sound one or not, all he meant to contend for was that if such a proposal was to be made it was time the fact should be known. He did not say they were going too far, but they might be going too fast. He would put it to the right hon. Gentleman and the House to say how long if household suffrage, pure and simple, were granted to Scotland it would be possible to retain in England even a shred of those restrictions which they had been engaged in discussing for the past few weeks. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be able to give an answer to his remarks which would be regarded by the Scotch Members as satisfactory.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am not at all surprised that the right hon. Gentleman who is a distinguished Scotch Member should feel a natural curiosity about the measure which the Government proposed to introduce with respect to the representation of Scotland. I am still less surprised that, having been also a distinguished Member of the late Government, he should take a fair and legitimate opportunity to make some criticisms on the past and probable future conduct of the Administration. As to the instance which he has adduced as an argument to prove that it is our duty to bring in a Scotch Reform Bill at an early period—I mean the Motion of my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for India (Sir James Fergusson), which was discussed at considerable length at the time, and which led to an important division—I can only say that I do not think it tells exactly in favour of the right hon. Gentleman's position, inasmuch as the Motion was unsuccessful. That being so, and wishing always to profit by experience, I must protest against the supposition that we, sitting on these Benches, are bound to adopt all those proposals which were unsuccessful while we sat on the Benches opposite. But nothing is more reasonable than the wish of the right hon. Gentleman that the House should be made acquainted with our intentions in reference to the Scotch representation. I much regret that no inconsiderable delay should have taken place on the subject. I trust, however, the right hon. Gentleman will, in extenuation of that delay, take into account the remarkable and peculiar difficulties which the Government and myself—to whom this business of Reform has been mainly intrusted in its management in this House—have had to encounter. The difficulties connected with the English measure have, in the first place, been very considerable. It is not easy to launch a vessel of such magnitude under any circumstances, but those which we had to contend with were unusually adverse. We have not had the advantage of an able coadjutor in the person of the Lord Advocate. I have felt very much the great inconvenience arising from that circumstance. Several questions have been asked me at different times by hon. Gentlemen connected with Scotland as to the nature of our Bill, and if I have not explicitly replied to them it has been only because I have been in daily hopes that I might have the opportunity of introducing the measure. One is often liable to misapprehension in giving answers to isolated points of inquiry. I hope the Bill will soon be in the hands of hon. Gentlemen. But I have no desire to avoid answering the questions put to me to-night by the right hon. Gentleman; and, after the delay which has unintentionally occurred, I will tell him, as nearly as I can, the character of the measure. It is framed upon the model of the English Bill, as I said it would be when I first noticed it in this House. With regard to the main provisions, they are founded on the same principles, so far as differences in the circumstances of the two countries will permit. With regard to the franchise, in which the right hon. Gentleman, by his inquiry to-night, is particularly interested—namely, the borough franchise, it is identical with that proposed in the English Bill. There is no hard and fast line. Every householder who is rated to the poor and who personally pays his rates will possess the franchise. I deny that in the English Bill there are heavy restrictions. That is a complete misapprehension of the right hon. Gentleman. The conditions of the borough franchise in England are the being rated to the poor and personally paying the rates. These are the same conditions which we have introduced into the Scotch Bill. If Scotland is not blessed with the compound-

householder, that is "one of the results of modern civilization," on which she may be congratulated. The Bill which we are about to introduce with regard to the representation in Scotland is, I repeat, framed on the same principle as the English Bill. The franchise for boroughs—respecting which the right hon. Gentleman is desirous of having explicit information—is identical with the borough franchise proposed for England. If this Bill passes every householder in a Scotch burgh who is rated to the poor, and personally pays his rate, will be entitled to a vote. There is another point on which the right hon. Gentleman made some observations, and I beg to state that on that point, as on the previous one relating to the franchise, Her Majesty's Government will be found to have fulfilled their promise. It is the opinion of the Government that the representation of Scotland is not sufficient. We believe that the claims of that country to increased representation are of a character which, on a general revision of this question, cannot be denied. We shall make a proposal on this subject which we think will be deemed fair and adequate. I trust that I have now answered the inquiries of the right hon. Gentleman with sufficient explicitness. If there be any point which I have omitted I shall be glad to be reminded of it. I can tell him, with great satisfaction I hope to him, and certainly to myself, that the Bill is not only drawn, but printed—that I have a proof copy of it in my possession, and that I hope to be able to introduce it on Thursday.

MR. ESMONDE said, he wished to ask, whether the Irish Reform Bill would be introduced at the same time as the Scotch Bill?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am afraid we shall not be able to bring it in at the same time; but we shall attend to the interests of Ireland.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. WALPOLE moved for leave to bring in a Bill for the more effectually and better securing the use of certain Royal Parks and Gardens for the recreation and enjoyment of Her Majesty's subjects. He said, that the object of the measure was to enable the law to be better enforced, not to alter it excepting as to the remedy. The Bill provided that no meeting of a public character should take place or be held without the permission of Her Majesty in any of the Royal Parks within the metropolis; and that any person convening, or assisting in convening, any public meeting in contravention of that Act, or any person joining or taking part in such a meeting, should be liable to be arrested and summarily convicted on application before one of the police magistrates, and on his conviction should be liable either to a penalty not exceeding £10, or to be imprisoned for a term not exceeding two months.

MR. WHALLEY said, he wished to ask, whether there was any difference in the right hon. Gentleman's view between the meeting to be held in the Park on Monday and the meeting held there in July last? If there were any such difference, what was it? He was not speaking in the interests of the Reform League, for, if he had any voice with that body, he would try and put an end to the meeting. He was anxious to see the rather unsatisfactory conclusion of the previous discussion which had taken place that evening cleared up.

MR. WALPOLE said, he had only to repeat that it would be the object of the Government to do nothing whatever which might tend to provoke a breach of the peace. At the same time, seeing what the law was and what the rights of the Crown were, they must take the necessary measures of precaution, so as to guard against any breach of the peace or any damage to life or property. With that object a sufficient force would be prepared and ready. He hoped, however, that seeing the conciliatory spirit in which the Government had acted, other parties would take such a course that there would be no probability of danger or of disturbance.

Bill for the better and more effectually securing the use of certain Royal Parks and Gardens for the enjoyment and recreation of Her Majesty's Subjects, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Secretary WALPOLE, Lord JOHN MANNERS, and Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 184.]

till Monday next.
